Airbus in Ascendancy Europe Jetmaker Claims Half the Market

By Barry James
International Herald Tribune

PARIS — Airbus Industrie said Monday it had achieved its goal of winning half of the world market for big commercial jets, and company executives said the European consortium was in a position to compete on an equal basis with Boeing Co. of the United States.

John Leahy, the vice president for commercial affairs, said Airbus had come through the Asian financial crisis relatively unscathed. Boeing has blamed the crisis, along with aggressive pricing by Airbus, for a slump that has led it to plan thousands of layoffs.

Mr. Leahy said Airbus considered the Asian crisis to have "bottomed out."

Airbus reported 556 firm orders valued at $39 billion in 1998 in addition to commitments by airlines — letters of intent or memorandums of understanding — for a further 174 aircraft, raising the total to 730.

The 556 orders, all for aircraft with 125 or more seats, represented a 20 percent increase in sales and a 30 percent increase in value over 1997, the Airbus president, Noel Forgeard, said.

Boeing said last week that it received orders for 656 planes in 1998, 15 percent more than in 1997, but that those orders' total value, $42.2 billion, represented a drop from the previous year because a greater proportion were for smaller and less profitable aircraft.

Mr. Forgeard said the four-nation European consortium last year delivered 229 aircraft valued at $13.3 billion, compared with $11.6 billion the previous year, and said Airbus had a record four-year backlog of orders for 1,309 aircraft worth $92.7 billion.

Boeing last year delivered a record 563 aircraft and said it expected to increase the total to 620 in 1999. But it suffered a loss-making litany of problems as it ramped up production facilities.

Mr. Leahy said Airbus differed from Boeing in that it was seeking a steadier growth in production capability, rather than aiming for the peaks.

With civil aviation industry in one of its cyclical downturns, Mr. Forgeard said sales would probably slow this year from the record number last year. Nevertheless, he said the peaks and troughs of the cycle were less extreme than in the past and that the company would not have to revise plans to increase output at sites in Hamburg and Toulouse, France.

Mr. Forgeard predicted that Airbus would be producing more than 300 aircraft a year in 2000, enough to satisfy nearly half the expected annual

Secularist In Turkey Forms New Government

Parliament's Approval
Expected for Ecevit's
Minority Leftist Cabinet

By Stephen Kinzer
New York Times Service

ISTANBUL — Turkey's six-week-old political crisis appeared to end Monday when a strongly secular politician, Bulent Ecevit, announced that he had assembled a minority government. It is expected to win parliamentary approval by Sunday.

The country has been without a functioning government since Nov. 25, when Prime Minister Mesut Yilmaz, who was implicated in a corruption scandal, lost a confidence vote in Parliament. He has remained in office as a caretaker.

It is uncertain how long Mr. Ecevit will remain in power. An election is scheduled for April, but President Suleyman Demirel and powerful military commanders want to postpone it. They fear that a quick election will produce new gains for the Islamic political movement.

Mr. Ecevit's government will be the sixth since the last election, in December 1995. That election led to a government headed by the Islamic leader Necmettin Erbakan. His policies angered the country's military commanders, who are committed to secularism, and they orchestrated a campaign that led to his resignation after one year in office.

In the political bickering that has split the country since then, Mr. Ecevit has solidified his position as one of Turkey's most steadfast secularists. He is also a strong nationalist, and is remembered as the prime minister who ordered troops to Cyprus in 1974 in what he described as a "peace operation" to protect the Turkish minority there. These convictions make him acceptable to the military despite the fact that he is a lifelong leftist.

The cabinet that Mr. Ecevit presented Monday is made up almost entirely of members of his own Democratic Left Party. Although the party is a minority in Parliament, other power brokers have signaled that they will support it.

Key figures from the outgoing government will keep their jobs, among them Foreign Minister Ismail Cem, who is considered pro-Western; Finance Minister Zekeriya Temizel, whose immediate task will be to help negotiate a new loan agreement with the International Monetary Fund; and Education Minister Hikmet Ulugbay, who has angered some Muslims with his campaign against religious influence in schools and universities.

Mr. Ecevit has been a political figure in Turkey for more than 40 years, beginning with his first election to Parliament in 1957. In the 1970s he served three terms as prime minister.

He is one of a handful of elderly politicians who have, depending on one's point of view, given Turkey political continuity or kept it in the grip of an unresponsive elite.

Among the most fateful of Mr. Ecevit's policies was his work in the 1970s to prevent Turkey from joining the European Union, then called the European Community. He believed it represented capitalist forces seeking to dominate Turkey and pull it away from its allies in the Middle East. Turkey is now committed to joining the Union, but no longer finds the climate as welcoming as it was then.

Mr. Ecevit is the godfather of Turkey's political left. He has maintained his convictions even in the face of trials, assassination attempts and prison terms. Critics say he clings to outdated views.

Tide Turning As UN States Look to Ease Iraq Embargo

By Barbara Crossette
New York Times Service

UNITED NATIONS, New York — As a new Security Council takes shape and returns this week to the unfinished business of Iraq, a strong consensus is forming here and in the Arab world that Saddam Hussein's government must remain under tight international sanctions indefinitely — but that now is the time to free millions of other Iraqis from a crippling economic embargo.

For the council, the major problem is how to achieve this without giving any ground, real or psychological, to President Saddam, whom even some Arab countries now openly condemn and would like to see replaced. No one, however, has put forward a plan for winning Iraq's cooperation or creating an enforcement system.

The council will meet Tuesday to look at the relief situation in Iraq, the president for January, Celso Amorim of Brazil, said Monday.

"Before we're able to address the broader political issues of Iraq," he said, "we have to address some concrete steps that can be taken both on the humanitarian file and the disarmament file."

Acknowledging the inertia that has seized the council on the subject of Iraq, Mr. Amorim said: "There was a general feeling that the Security Council has to deal substantively with the issue, which it hasn't been doing for the past two or three weeks."

For the Clinton administration, which has so far offered no new ideas, the growing consensus for change will make it increasingly difficult to keep sanctions intact and still seek to alleviate the deprivation of ordinary Iraqis by raising the amount of money Iraq would be permitted to sell under the "oil for food" program.

The United States is finding that the core group opposed to its policies on Iraq, formed around Russia, China, France and sometimes Brazil, has strengthened with the entry of at least two new council members, Malaysia and Namibia, which will hold two-year rotating seats. Diplomats say that both, but Malaysia especially, have already appeared to back Russia's determined intention of lifting sanctions and re-constructing completely the arms inspection system.

Nonpermanent council members do not have vetoes, but they have voices that strengthen a majority opinion, forcing even a powerful nation to consider the diplomatic consequences of flouting a consensus.

Monday in Moscow, the Foreign Ministry called again for the dismissal of Richard Butler, the executive chairman of the UN Special Commission, known as Unsmoc, which has been responsible for dismantling Iraq since the Rebels on the Rim In Sierra Leone

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone (Reuters) — A West African regional bloc said its Nigerian-led troops were driving rebels out of this capital Monday and had retaken the presidency building.

The statement came hours after witnesses heard heavy shelling and gunfire coming from the central district of Freetown that the Economic Community of West African States said. "Ecomog has successfully taken control of the Statehouse."

To Clinton, History's the Real Judge White House Is Already Busy Putting a Spin on President's Record

By Peter Baker
Washington Post Service

WASHINGTON — With the Senate unlikely to muster 67 votes for conviction, what is at stake for President Bill Clinton as his impeachment trial begins in earnest this week may not be whether he remains in office but how this episode and his presidency will be viewed by history.

Mr. Clinton, long obsessed about his legacy, now accepts that he will never be able to erase the taint of being only the second president ever impeached. But the way the trial is conducted and how senators conclude it, even assuming they do not convict Mr. Clinton, could determine whether future generations remember him as a scandalous rogue crippled by his philandering and deceit or a talented president victimized by a partisan and puritanical witch hunt.

And so for a White House that has made a fine art out of spinning the latest news cycle, the challenge now is figuring out a way to spin history.

The president's allies have wasted little time in this endeavor, making their first stab at it on the same day that Mr. Clinton was impeached by the House for "high crimes and misdemeanors." Within hours of the votes, Vice President Al Gore appeared at Mr. Clinton's side on the South Lawn to declare that the House action "does a great disservice to a man I believe will be regarded in the history books as one of our greatest presidents."

In aiming his remarks not at the Senate jurors but at posterity, Mr. Gore set the tone for a White House interpretation that aides hope to cement as the trial unfolds — that the prosecution of the president, no matter how it concludes, has been illegitimate and will be viewed that way by children studying it

Dismissal of Case Not Sought Now

President Bill Clinton's lawyers filed a strongly worded legal brief Monday, but they bowed to the wishes of the Senate and decided not to immediately introduce a motion of dismissal that could trigger a divisive partisan debate. A spokesman, Joe Lockhart, said that a motion to dismiss the trial was delayed because "we respect the prerogatives of the Senate to set the rules." Page 3.

decades from now. "It was clearly getting that marker down in that direction," said a White House official who did not want to be identified. "It's very debatable how this is going to be looked on and obviously we want to push that view of things."

In the weeks since the House approved two articles of impeachment on Dec. 19, White House strategy deliberations have been filtered in part through that same legacy lens, particularly the discussion over how aggressively to seek a full trial and acquittal vs. short-circuiting the process through a congressional resolution that would remove Mr. Clinton while leaving him in office.

Although the president has said he would accept censure to avoid a drawn-out battle, confidants say he is tempted at times to hold out for acquittal and nothing else on the theory that such a verdict would vindicate him.

A variety of outside advisers have pressed this view with him and his aides, including the campaign consultant James Carville, the Hollywood producer Harry Thomason, Dale Bumbers, a former Democratic senator from Arkansas, and Senator Tom Harkin, Democrat of Iowa. "The reason I'm enamored of a Jobs for Cambodians — or Sweatshops?

PHNOM PENH — At dawn each day, hundreds of shift workers file into garment factories dotted around a city that just over two decades ago was virtually an empty shell.

The factories, most of which have sprung up only in the past two and half years, are seen by some economists and development experts as harbingers of a better future for Cambodia after a nightmare era of civil war, internal upheaval and foreign occupation.

"For the first time in Cambodia's history, there is a domestic shift from agricultural and domestic activities to a more modern manufacturing economy," said R. Natarajan, chief representative of the World Bank in Cambodia. The garment investors may not have any altruistic intentions, but their money brings new skills for people who were unemployed. They form the basis of a more adaptable Cambodian work force for the future.

But critics, including Cambodia's political opposition and American trade unions, charge that in its eagerness to rekindle economic growth and promote exports, the Cambodian government is overlooking serious labor and human-rights abuses.

The 'Small People' Demand Justice

U.S. officials are due to arrive in Phnom Penh on Jan. 21 to discuss these charges. They will also look at the possibility of imposing quotas, given the explosive growth of Cambodian apparel exports to the United States.

"Working conditions remain awful and have recently deteriorated at most factories," said Sam Rainey, leader of the parliamentary opposition.

Over the last 12 months, salaries have been reduced from $40 a month, for 48 working hours a week, to $30 for many workers. Even for a very poor country like Cambodia, this is not a living salary."

At last count, there were more than 110 garment factories — up from just 30 in 1996 — that spent $3 million a month in wages for their 72,000 employees, according to the Commerce Ministry here. Nearly all the factories are operated by investors from Malaysia, Hong Kong, Taiwan, South Korea, China, Singapore and other Asian countries that have bilateral textile agreements, including quotas, with the United States.

They were attracted to Cambodia by low wages and quota-free access to the giant U.S. market after the United States, in May 1997, removed the formerly Communist country from a high-tariff regime and gave it normal access, or HAVANA — Some days Avilio Guia likes to come and sit outside the new Carlos III Market and watch the people coming and going from dollar-only shops.

He was a foreman on the construction team that built the mall a year ago. Now, it is a world out of his reach. His government salary is only 600 pesos a month, less than $30. He has no way to earn hard currency, and the shops inside accept nothing else.

"I could never buy anything here," the 56-year-old builder said, balancing in his hardened hand the cheap cigar he bought in a government store and peering up at his work, at the abstract sculptures hanging from the ceiling, the colored lights and the colorful walkway lined with shops selling jewelry, electronics and toys. "The people who shop here are mostly people with relatives in the United States," he said.

Ten years after the Soviet bloc collapsed and cut off Havana's lifeline of subsidies and aid, Cubans struggle to survive in a dual economy, fueled in large part by money flowing from their greatest enemy, the United States. Washington has maintained a 37-year embargo on its nearest Caribbean neighbor but moved recently toward marginally more contact, announcing last week that it would permit payments from Cuban émigrés and other Americans to increase.

The once egalitarian island has evolved into a society of haves and have-nots, where schoolteachers and doctors supplement meager state incomes with ingenious moonlighting known as inventando, or inventing. Hotel workers make far more than professionals. More and more people are turning to illegal schemes, running gypsy cabs, engaging in prostitution or in black-market sales of Cuba's famous cigars, rum and coffee.

Other Cubans have abandoned state jobs and opened small businesses under new rules allowing self-employment in the faint hope of earning more than they did from the state.

Driving these trends is a simple reality: State-controlled wages have remained frozen while prices have risen dramatically. Even though President Fidel Castro's government continues to dis-

Cambodia Confronts its Past

By Seth Mydans
New York Times Service

PHNOM PENH — "I'm just a small person," said Un Samath, a customs inspector, using a common phrase among Cambodians, "so I dare not say."

But then he got angry, and he said it. "I hate them," he said of the defuncting Khmer Rouge leaders who recently flaunted their impunity in a tourist trip around Cambodia.

"So long as it doesn't cause a war, I want to see them on trial," he said. "Cambodians cannot be happy as long as they are happy."

And then, like a man who has decided that the time has come to speak, Un Samath, 46, described the pain he shares with almost every other Cambodian of his generation: the killings of family members, the years of fear and hunger, the loss of youth and education, the continuing harshness of life.

It was just one of countless unburied wounds that are taking place among Cambodians today as the country seems to be embarking, spontaneously, on a long-delayed national conversation about its traumatic past.

In Phnom Penh, the capital, and in Battambang, the country's second-largest city, interviews with a score of people from market vendors to professors suggest that a common legacy of anger and pain is being shared in a new way.

As Cambodia struggles to break with its feudal past, the comments also suggest an emerging political assertiveness among people who are better informed and more aware of their rights. Recently, several political parties and labor unions have formed, and people are coming forward to seek redress for land seizure or the dumping of toxic waste, wrongs that in the past they might simply have accepted as their fate.

The seemingly near-unanimous view is that Khmer Rouge leaders should be put on trial, if only to determine who is to blame for the country's suffering, and even if any convictions are followed by an amnesty.

If this is so, it offers a response to those who fear that international pressure for a trial amounts to a new burden. It is also a response to the defectors' assertion that pressure for a trial comes from a foreign intervention against the will of the people.

There has still been no real assessment of the national will. Prime Minister Hun Sen has asserted that people do not want a trial, while King Norodom Sihanouk has stated that they do.

From 1975 to 1979, more than a million Cambodians died from malnutrition, overwork, untreated diseases or executions. After a wave of anger mourning in the early 1980s, Cambodia settled into a state of stunned denial, its psychic wounds unacknowledged and festering.

The surrender of two Khmer Rouge leaders, Khieu Samphan and Nuon Chea, and their welcome by the government have apparently aroused these buried emotions.

"This is the major topic now that people talk about," said Kao Kim Houn, who heads the Cambodian Institute for Cooperation and Peace. "People from all walks of life have begun to question what happened in that period. They share a common past, a common suffering and therefore a common outrage when they see these mass killers returning to the mainstream of society."

Researchers say that even as international pressure grows to put Khmer Rouge leaders on trial for crimes against humanity, a dozen of them are living freely in Cambodia, following the collapse of their guerrilla movement in recent months.

After Mr. Hun Sen welcomed the defectors two weeks ago, saying, "We should dig a hole and bury the past," he found it politically necessary to issue what he called a clarification a few days later and declare that he was all for justice.

But the government has not yet said whether it will seek to arrest the defectors, who are in Pailin, a remote town near the Thai border where they are protected by armed former guerrillas.

With popular emotions stirring, Kao Kim Houn said, "Internal pressure on the government has begun to build up." He added: "National reconciliation at all costs? Bury the past? Forgive and forget? No. I don't think that is the case now."

If indeed a more politically demanding society is emerging, it may be one positive legacy of the huge international effort at democratization organized by the United Nations at the start of the decade.

Despite the violent power politics that has persistently stunted the establishment of democracy and human rights, a fledgling civil society has begun to emerge, led by about 200 local nongovernmental agencies, most with foreign funding.

The country's nascent discussion also offers a remembrance of the dead as people recount their losses. When they talk about the past, Cambodians commonly offer lists of family members who died at the hands of the Khmer Rouge.

King Sihanouk, in a statement Thursday, published a list of victims that included five children, 14 grandchildren, two cousins, a half-uncle and a son-in-law.

Kao Kim Houn, 32, lost a younger brother and sister. He said he still dreamed about them. When he was a college student in the United States, he said, his roommate called him "the wall beater" because of his violent nightmares.

Chhouh Sokheang, 44, a university instructor, lost his father, an uncle, an aunt, a cousin and about 25 other family members.

Lim Navy, 39, who sells construction material, said she lost an uncle, two uncles-in-law and more cousins than she can count. "If we start thinking about what the Khmer Rouge did," she said, "we just want to chop them up like minced pork."

Khmer Rouge soldiers killed more than 1 million citizens and wounded countless others, including one survivor who recently demonstrated his scars. In December two defectors, below, described their roles as demands grew for a full accounting.

Tintin's Latest Caper: A Symbol of Euroman

Cartoon Hero Still Popular on 70th Birthday

By Charles Truett
Washington Post Service

PARIS — As signs bloom of a new pan-European mentality, the search is on for that elusive Everyman who can represent the cherished values that all peoples on the Old Continent share.

A cartoon character, Captain Euro, has been proposed as the new currency's superhero. But he won't do, lacking either history or heart. And why invent what exists already? Europe's emblematic person has been around for 70 years, and there's scarcely anyone on this side of the Atlantic who doesn't know his name: Tintin.

Tintin is a young man known by the flaxen mop that comes to a point on the top of his bubble head. As cartoon hero, he is as familiar to Europeans as Superman is to Americans, and he shares his pluck and invincibility. His perilous adventures have taken him from the unnamed gray cities of mid-century Europe to Shanghai, Chicago, Peru, the Balkans, the Congo — and the moon, 15 years before Americans got there.

The 22 Tintin books have been translated into 56 languages and sell rather well, in English, in Britain. Some 200 million copies have been sold to date, and 1.5 million French-language copies move off the shelves every year. De Gaulle once expressed his jealousy that Tintin was better known in the world than he.

Associated the world over with France, Tintin is officially Belgian. This is a fitting nationality for him today, as the European Union institutions are mainly in the informal capital of Europe, Brussels, citadel of compromise.

Tintin's creator, the late Georges Remi, was a Belgian illustrator who told interviewers he dreamed up the Tintin character in "five minutes" under a deadline to produce the Roman Catholic newspaper supplement in Brussels where he got his start 70 years ago. The introverted Remi took the pen name Hergé (air-jay), which is the way his initials sound, reversed, when pronounced in French.

Tintin is neither a particularly Belgian type nor a French one. "He's an ambassador of Europe in the world," observed Pierre Assolonne, Hergé's biographer. "He represents universal values: friendship, loyalty, kindness, generosity, courage. He never shoots a gun, yet he never fails to put the bad guy out of commission."

Yet, Mr. Assolonne pointed out, as a symbol of Europe or humankind, Tintin is an odd choice, and his persistent popularity in the age of Nintendo warfare is puzzling.

He is a perpetual adolescent without a discernible inner self. He wears golfing knickerbockers most of the time. He never so much as glances at a woman, and few of them even appear in the books. His constant companion is a little white dog, Milou, with whom he can communicate telepathically.

Tintin's best friend and chronic albatross is a bearded, whiskey-swilling sailor, Capitaine Haddock. Haddock is given to too much drink and torrents of now-classic invective. But he has the virtue of owning a glorious chateau, Moulinart, on a wooded estate. Tintin is perhaps a kept man.

Although he is ostensibly a journalist, a kind of roving reporter able to follow his nose to danger and injustice, Tintin almost never appears with pen and paper, at a typewriter, or talking to an editor. Journalists interview him.

One of Tintin's assets as a candidate for Eurotopia is that he is surrounded by a cast of characters as diverse as Europeans themselves. They represent not so much the ethnic stew of Europe — the Tintin cast is heavily, embarrassingly Nordic — as its pronounced eccentricities and follies: the raving-mad, idiot-savant Tournesol, the hapless identical detectives Dupont and Dupond, the befuddled butler Nestor, the ear-splitting diva Bianca Castaflore and every stripe of ne'er-do-well in a raincoat, a kimono, a djellaba, or a uniform. Hergé was an accomplished satirist, even though his hero was a two-dimensional goody-goody.

Hergé was an accomplished satirist, even though his hero was a two-dimensional goody-goody.

The bizarre Tintin menagerie, antique though it is, still holds the European imagination.

Editorial cartoons trot out Tintin the way American ones use Uncle Sam. European philosophers have plumbed the postmodern meaning of Tintin to an end. And meaning, in Europe, means politics.

Was Tintin from the left or the right? That's the question that will be debated in the august surroundings of the French National Assembly in February, thanks to the legislators' own chapter of the Tintinologists' Society.

Tintin's 70th birthday, Jan. 10, is being marked by the republication of the very first album, "Tintin in the Land of the Soviets." It is, beyond being a pale story compared with those that follow, a crude anti-Communist yarn involving Bolshevik clowns in grotesques. It so embarrassed Hergé and his publishers that they withdrew it from circulation in the 1950s.

Bernard Vivier, who owns a shop in the Paris Marais district that sells Tintinabilia, is among the majority who are convinced Tintin was, if not a crypto-fascist, then the artistic offspring of one.

"You'd never have confessed to enjoying Tintin in '68," recalled Mr. Vivier, or the rabidly nationalist Asterix comics either. The transparently royalist Babar, of course, was beyond the pale.

Petit Vingtième, where Tintin was first serialized, was a rightist Belgian Catholic sheet for young audiences. "Tintin au Congo," the second album, is pure colonial paternalism. That and other albums were cleansed of incorrect details when color editions of all those then in print were printed in the 1940s and '50s: Swardy and malign Jews became swardy and malign Europeans of indeterminate origin; black Americans became white ones.

"He represents universal values: friendship, loyalty, kindness, generosity, courage."

Hergé was a classic "neutral" in wartime Belgium, which is to say that he went on building his profitable cartoon empire under Nazi occupation and was accused of collaboration after the war, and ever since. But even by the mid-1930s, Hergé, and thus, indirectly, Tintin, was having a revelation that would lead him to create one of his most memorable minor characters and symbols of humane values, the Chinese boy Tchang.

Introduced in "Le Lotus Bleu," the artistic masterpiece of the Hergé oeuvre, Tchang returns in the late-career classic "Tintin in Tibet," where Tintin rescues him again and mouths platitudes about universal brotherhood. When Tchang Tchang-jen, the real-life Hergé friend on whom Tchang was based, died in France last fall, the front-page headlines needed no explanation: "Tchang is dead."

The problem with the Tintin industry is that it is a closed shop. Hergé, who died in 1983, never passed on the rights to produce new episodes of Tintin after his death. It might have been otherwise. Hergé tried to interest Walt Disney in the early 1950s in taking on his character, but the Disney people ignored him. Hergé rightly hated the feature films made from his characters — for starters, no known human looks like Tintin. But he was tempted late in his life by a filmmaker he admired deeply and with whom he shared an affinity for knowing the mind of the child in all of us.

Steven Spielberg wanted to adapt Tintin to the screen. Mr. Remi was ready to sign a contract, but balked when he saw that Mr. Spielberg retained the rights to the merchandising. Then Mr. Remi died.

But Mr. Spielberg essentially went ahead with the project, creating a Tintin in the American vernacular, this one with a better haircut. His name was Indiana Jones.

U.S. and U.K. Shutter Uganda Sites for Day

KAMPALA, Uganda (AP) — The U.S. Embassy and the British High Commission here were closed Monday for undisclosed security reasons, a British official said.

The two missions share a building in the heart of Kampala and have been on high alert since the near simultaneous Aug. 7 terrorist bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

"All I can say is we are closed today for security reasons," said Simon Bond, press officer at the British mission in Kampala. "I cannot go into further detail." He said the U.S. Embassy was also closed.

Van Gogh Museum To Reopen June 24

AMSTERDAM (AP) — The Van Gogh Museum, home to an unrivaled collection of the Dutch master's paintings, will reopen June 24 after 10 months of renovation and expansion that has nearly doubled its exhibition space. The work of Vincent van Gogh's younger brother, Theo, will be showcased in an exhibition marking the reopening, the museum said Monday. Theo van Gogh was a respected 19th century art dealer and Vincent's main sponsor. The exhibition also will feature more than 200 works by other artists of the period.

The rebuilt and renovated Van Gogh Museum will feature a new wing to house temporary exhibitions and improved facilities for the public.

Seoul to Ask North To Open More Airspace

SEOUL (Reuters) — South Korea will ask North Korea in coming months to open its airspace further to foreign airlines to shorten routes to the United States and Europe, a local newspaper reported in its Tuesday edition.

The Korea Times quoted a senior aviation official at the Construction and Transportation Ministry as saying preparations were under way.

International passenger planes flew over North Korean airspace for the first time in April under an accord signed by Pyongyang and Seoul in late 1997.

A European Cold Snap Brings Traffic Chaos and Power Cuts

PARIS — Heavy snowfall and plunging temperatures caused chaos in parts of Southern and Western Europe on Monday, disrupting road, rail and air travel and leaving tens of thousands of people without electricity.

Southern France and the northern portions of Italy and Spain were among the worst affected regions. In France, police in the Rhone-Alpes region around Lyon reported traffic jams several kilometers long, while trains between Lyon and Paris were delayed up to three hours after snow damaged power lines. The snow also caused flight cancellations at the Lyon-Satolas airport.

As many as 39,300 homes were without electricity in villages in the southern Drome and Ardeche departments.

In northwestern Italy, more than 70,000 people were without electricity after a blizzard swept through the region, and heavy winds brought down trees and power lines.

In northern Spain, many roads remained blocked after weekend snowfalls, authorities said. Seven areas, including Catalonia and the Basque region, declared a state of emergency. Nearly 100 villages were cut off by the snow, but snowplow teams were working to clear the roads Monday. Forecasters predicted better weather from Tuesday.

Clinton's Lawyers Bow On Instant Dismissal

Brief to Senate Denies Impeachable Acts

By Brian Knowlton
International Herald Tribune

WASHINGTON — President Bill Clinton's lawyers filed a strongly worded legal brief Monday, denying that he committed impeachable offenses, but they bowed to the wishes of the Senate and decided not to immediately introduce a motion of dismissal that could trigger a divisive partisan debate.

The presidential spokesman, Joe Lockhart, said that a motion to dismiss the trial was delayed because "we respect the prerogatives of the Senate to set the rules."

He added, "We think that this thing should move forward expeditiously — it's in everyone's interests."

The 13-page White House brief, filed in reply to a Senate summons Friday, says that Mr. Clinton "denies each and every material allegation" against him. It holds that the two impeachment articles, which charge the president with perjury and obstruction of justice in the Monica Lewinsky affair, do not meet the "rigorous" standard set in the U.S. Constitution for removing a president.

"The charges in the articles do not rise to the level of 'high crimes and misdemeanors' as contemplated by the Founding Fathers and they do not satisfy the rigorous constitutional standard applied throughout our nation's history," the lawyers argued.

Senate Democrats had warned the White House that any early motion to dismiss the trial, especially on technical grounds, could undermine the sense of comity that emerged Friday in the Senate around a bipartisan plan for the trial.

Senator John Breaux, the chief deputy Democratic whip, said that to make such a motion based on a technicality, such as the fact that an outgoing Congress normally cannot leave any business for an incoming Congress, "would be a mistake."

At midday Thursday, the prosecutorial team of 13 House members is set to begin its opening arguments before the 100 senators and the chief justice of the United States, William Rehnquist, who will preside. Each side has been given 24 hours, probably over three days, to make its case.

In an awkward coincidence, that means the White House arguments would begin on Jan. 19, only hours before Mr. Clinton is scheduled to give his annual State of the Union address before a joint session of Congress.

"Despite calls from several Republicans for Mr. Clinton to postpone the message, or present it in writing, the White House confirmed that he planned to go ahead. "We have no intention of being diverted from that," said James Kennedy, a White House spokesman.

After opening arguments are over, the Senate will have 16 hours to question both sides. Only then will the Senate take up the question of whether to allow witnesses, and what evidence may be introduced. That sequence underscores the crucial importance of each side's making a persuasive opening argument.

Representative Henry Hyde, Republican of Illinois and the leader of the House prosecutorial team, said Monday that he was confident of making a persuasive case for witnesses. "We think the senators will be in a more generous mood, having heard our case," he said.

The White House and Democrats have insisted that witnesses are not needed and will only cause the trial to drag on for months; the House "managers" and most Senate Republicans have said that witnesses are necessary to explore contradictions in the written record supplied by the independent counsel Kenneth Starr.

A vote of 51 senators will be required to approve first the taking of depositions from any witness by lawyers and then the hearing of that witness by the Senate.

With most Republicans expressing support for witnesses, and Democrats holding a 55-45 edge over Democrats in the chamber, the key role of a handful of moderate Republicans has become clear.

Attention has focused on four New England senators: John Chafee of Rhode Island, Jim Jeffords of Vermont, and Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins, both of Maine. The group, which meets together regularly, will be regarded as bellwethers as the trial proceeds.

Mr. Chafee, presenting a view the others appear to hold, said Monday that witnesses would be useful to sort through conflicts of evidence.

"That doesn't mean an army of witnesses," he said on CNN, "but a limited number of witnesses, I think, would be appropriate."

Senator Collins made a similar comment Sunday.

The role of the four could be even more crucial once a motion is filed to dismiss the case, which would require 51 votes. The White House would need six Republicans, assuming that every Democrat voted in its favor.

A vote to remove Mr. Clinton from office would require 67 votes, which is considered highly unlikely.

'Love-Child' Snoopers Lay a Rumor to Rest

WASHINGTON — In Washington's seemingly endless sex wars, another allegation that had seeped into parts of the mainstream media has suddenly evaporated. From the Drudge Report on the Internet to the "Tonight" show on NBC, the word was that the supermarket tabloid the Star was investigating what turned out to be an utterly bogus charge by an Arkansas woman that President Bill Clinton had fathered her son during the 1980s. But a DNA test financed by the Star disproved the rumor, first published by another tabloid, the Globe, back in 1992.

"There was no match, nothing even close," Phil Bunton, editor at the Star, said Sunday. "We went into it thinking it was more likely to be untrue than true. We might run a couple of paragraphs saying we investigated it and it proved to be untrue."

Which raises a basic journalistic question: Why was the so-called "love child" story reported at all?

The Star, which brought the world Jennifer Flowers, had offered a large amount of money to the 13-year-old if his blood sample matched the description of the president's DNA in the report by the independent counsel, Kenneth Starr. The results, disproving his mother's charge, were reported over the weekend by Time magazine and in Matt Drudge's cyberspace column.

After Mr. Drudge disclosed the Star inquiry this month, the allegations quickly made their way into The New York Post, the New York Daily News, The Washington Times and the Boston Herald. (W/P)

Reno Breaks a Record

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Janet Reno on Monday became the longest-serving attorney general of this century, surpassing the record set 60 years ago by Homer Cummings, an attorney general in the administration of Franklin Roosevelt.

Ms. Reno's longevity at the Justice Department is notable because she got the job in March 1993 almost by accident when President Bill Clinton hurriedly plucked her from her job as the elected prosecutor in Dade County, Florida, after his first two nominations for attorney general collapsed.

Ms. Reno, 60, is unlikely to break the record for longest time in the post. That is held by William Wirt, who served for 11 years over the administrations of James Monroe and John Quincy Adams. (NYT)

Gore's Aim on Wall Street: Strut the Right Stuff

By Ianthe Jeanne Dugan
Washington Post Service

NEW YORK — When Vice President Al Gore walked into the Four Seasons Hotel in Manhattan in November for a luncheon in his honor, most of the crowd stood up and cheered. But in the dark-suited sea of 60 Wall Street honchos, some faces seemed out of place at a Democratic celebration.

What on earth was Henry Paulson, the conservative chief executive of Goldman, Sachs & Co., doing there? Also drawing double-takes was the J.P. Morgan & Co. chief, Douglas (Sandy) Warner, a well known Republican supporter.

They were invited by Steven Ratner, chief executive of the large investment bank Lazard Freres & Co., who has been a key force in helping Mr. Gore introduce his ideas on the economy and finance to a traditionally conservative contingent that has long associated the vice president with being more concerned about the environment and technology than high finance.

"The vice president is not as well known in the Wall Street community as the president," Mr. Ratner said. "But as people have gotten to know him, they have been impressed."

As Mr. Gore gears up for his presidential race, he is carefully wooing Wall Street, a source of not only potential campaign contributions but also credibility in the corporate world.

Using a trio of investment executives as his tour guides to Wall Street, Mr. Gore has been getting a crash education in the markets through breakfast brainstorming, White House coffees, New York jaunts and three Christmas parties at his home.

Wall Street executives and an aide to Mr. Gore said the vice president in turn has reached out to Wall Street officials to solicit advice on economic issues and to review his speeches on business matters. Executives have encouraged him to tone down the environment rhetoric and promote a broader theme — the track record of the economy.

Mr. Gore is embarking on what aides call "economics week," in which he will announce two budget initiatives designed to strengthen the economy, such as a doubling of the economic empowerment zones that have revitalized inner-city neighborhoods. An aide to Mr. Gore said the vice president played a crucial role in shaping the economic policies that fueled growth in recent years but took a backseat to the president. "Now, as we head into 2000," the aide said, "there's a desire to showcase what he's been doing behind the scenes."

The lunch at the Four Seasons was one of several "cultural" meetings organized by Mr. Ratner and two fellow executives — John Tisch of Loews Corp. and the money manager Orin Kramer, an aide to former President Jimmy Carter who contributed $295,000 in "soft money" to Democratic Party organizations in the 1997-98 election cycle, according to Federal Election Commission records. Loosely regulated soft money is used by the party for general purposes, such as issue advertising and voter-registration drives.

The trio has become a quasi "kitchen cabinet" working behind the scenes virtually since Mr. Clinton's 1996 victory to help Mr. Gore meet and convert key figures on Wall Street. Mr. Ratner, Mr. Tisch and Mr. Kramer headed fund-raising efforts this month, serving as the New York muscle of a national effort expected to raise $1 million by the end of January. Previously, they had helped raise $1 million for Leadership '98, Mr. Gore's political action committee.

To pave the way to the financial support, Mr. Gore first had to refashion his image to appeal to a conservative world in which executives often supported Republicans whose policies served wealthy investors. That is why he has emphasized economic growth.

Mr. Gore especially turned to these executives in August, when the Russian debt default threatened to destabilize world financial markets. The vice president wanted to understand the ramifications, so he invited a Wall Street "Who's Who" to the White House.

Mr. Tisch, Mr. Ratner and Mr. Kramer attended the meeting, along with a list of powerful executives that included the global investor George Soros; the Bankers Trust Corp. chief executive, Frank Newman; Lehman Brothers Inc.'s chief executive, Richard Fuld; and David Shaw, a former Columbia University computer science professor who runs a major investment pool.

"He asked us for our ideas," Mr. Shaw recalled. Mr. Soros suggested a credit-insurance facility to help combat what several people advised the vice president was a severe credit crunch. Some suggestions appear to be echoed in parts of the Brazilian rescue package coordinated by the International Monetary Fund and actions taken by the Group of Seven industrialized nations a few weeks later. "I thought all he was interested in was science and the environment," said Mr. Shaw, who contributed $220,000 in soft money to Democrats in 1997-98. "I was surprised when I met him how much he knew about the economy and finance."

Colombia Rightists Massacre Scores

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches

BOGOTA — Retaliating for a rebel assault on their headquarters two weeks ago, rightist Colombian militias killed at least 111 people in a series of massacres during a 48-hour period, according to police officials.

The worst of the attacks was in the hamlet of Playon de Orocco, where about 30 people were killed Saturday and 17 houses burned down, the state police commander, Colonel Octavio Grajales, said Sunday.

He told RCN radio that villagers in the town, 640 kilometers (400 miles) north of Bogota, were attacked as they were leaving a baptismal Mass at a local church. He said the gunmen were carrying lists of intended victims.

The national police operations chief, General Alfredo Salgado, said at least 20 people were killed Sunday in La Hormiga, a southern town near Ecuador that is a hub of the cocaine trade. Most of the victims were partying at a discotheque, the police said.

Rightist paramilitary groups have carried out at least 20 attacks, most concentrated in remote farming areas in the north, since President Andres Pastrana's government initiated peace talks with leftist rebels Thursday. A rightist leader said the aim of the violence was to force the Colombian government to grant the rightists the type of political legitimacy that it is giving the rebels.

The Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, has said peace talks will go nowhere unless the government disbands the landowner-backed militias that have been killing suspected civilian sympathizers of the rebels for more than a decade.

The top paramilitary leader, Carlos Castano, said in a newspaper interview published Sunday that he supported the peace process as the only way to end 34 years of civil conflict. (AP, AFP)

Supreme Court Backs N.Y. on Strip-Club Law

The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — New York City's zoning crack-down on strip clubs and sex shops got a green light Monday from the U.S. Supreme Court.

The court, without comment, rejected appeals in which such enterprises and their patrons had argued that the regulations denied free speech and threatened legal businesses. The appeals said federal courts had wrongly deferred to New York state court rulings that had upheld the regulations.

The city prohibits sex-oriented theaters, bookstores, massage parlors and dance clubs from operating within 500 feet (150 meters) of homes, houses of worship, schools or each other.

In other cases, the court made these rulings:

- It refused to reinstate a child molester's prison sentence, set aside by Nebraska's highest court because a judge quoted Bible verses before imposing the man's punishment. The justices let stand the state court's ruling that the sentence was invalid because reasonable people might question the judge's impartiality.

- It refused to revive an Arizona measure that declared English the state's official language and required its use in most government transactions. The law was struck down by the state Supreme Court last April as a violation of free-speech rights.

- It again left intact the military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy, rejecting a challenge by two former servicemen who had been discharged after declaring their homosexuality. The justices turned away arguments that the policy was based on prejudice against homosexuals and violated free-speech rights.

Away From Politics

The recent wave of tougher sentencing laws has succeeded in making criminals serve longer prison sentences and slowed the release of inmates, helping to increase the U.S. prison population even as crime has dropped in the 1990s, according to the first study of the new laws by the Justice Department. (NYT)

Four women were arrested at LaGuardia Airport after they claimed 13 suitcases filled with an estimated total of $1 million worth of marijuana. Police from the Port Authority of New York made the arrests after being tipped off that about 400 pounds (about 180 kilograms) of drugs were being brought to New York on a flight from Los Angeles, a police spokesman said. (AP)

An appeals court has postponed the execution of a murderer who has vowed to "fight like hell" when guards arrive to escort him to the death chamber in Texas. Prison officials had planned to use shackles and armor-clad guards to take Gary Graham to his execution. Instead, the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals postponed the death, saying it needed more time to "evaluate the issues presented in this complex case." (AP)

Hong Kong Opposition Gets Call to Barricades

By Mark Landler
New York Times Service

HONG KONG — Eight months after it won a resounding victory in legislative elections here, Hong Kong's opposition movement is divided over whether the Democratic Party should abandon elective politics and take its cause to the streets.

In an extraordinary meeting Sunday, a group of young party members called on their leaders, in effect, to man the barricades. Declaring that Hong Kong's government was strangling the growth of democracy, the young members said the party should focus on mobilizing "the masses" rather than running for seats on Hong Kong's largely toothless

Legislative Council

"Having one or two more seats won't change anything," said Andrew To, a leader of the so-called Young Turks. "All democratic movements come from the masses on the streets. You need martyrs to change the system."

Such a call to arms is startling in Hong Kong, where politics is hardly a contact sport and where even the most strident opposition leaders have tried to work within the system. But these are frustrating times for this former British colony, which reverted to Chinese rule just as Asia was slipping into recession.

As Hong Kong's government searches for a way out of its worst economic crisis since World War II, democratic leaders say it has hobbled the pace of reform and marginalized its chief advocates.

Although the Democratic Party won 43 percent of the vote in the elections last May, the most of any party, it received just 13 of the 60 seats in the Legislative Council under Hong Kong's electoral laws. And the party's leaders have been granted only two meetings with Hong Kong's chief executive, Tung Chee-hwa, a shipping magnate appointed by Beijing.

After the second meeting, on Saturday, the party's chairman, Martin Lee, lashed out at Mr. Tung, calling him a "benign dictator."

"Mr. Tung doesn't believe in democracy, and it is no surprise that his administration is devoted to thwarting it," said Mr. Lee, a lawyer whose proper manner and professorial mien belied his fighting words.

These days, though, the leaders of the Democratic Party seem to spend less time fighting Mr. Tung than squabbling among themselves.

Mr. Lee, who holds a seat on the Legislative Council, says his party must continue to work within the system because it was elected by the voters to do that. He notes that when the Chinese government dissolved the last freely elected Legislative Council on July 1, 1997, the opposition leaders vowed to regain their representation.

But Mr. To, a 32-year-old university lecturer, said the legislature "wastes time debating unimportant issues." He said the party should focus instead on organizing street protests and demonstrations.

Neither Mr. Lee nor Mr. To thinks that the party will fracture. Political experts agreed that a split was unlikely. For one, it is not clear how many parties a politically apathetic Hong Kong can support. In a city of 2.7 million voters, the Democratic Party has only 600 members.

Moreover, the Young Turks lack a recognized leader like Mr. Lee, who travels the world advocating democracy in Hong Kong. With so few elective offices here, the young members are unlikely to have one soon. Experts said that lack of opportunity explains their frustration.

The Legislative Council itself plays second fiddle to the strong executive branch. It cannot, for instance, even introduce legislation without Mr. Tung's agreement.

And within the legislature, Mr. Tung plays favorites, opposition leaders said. While he has little to do with the democrats, they said he heaps praise on Hong Kong's leading pro-Beijing party.

"Part of the problem is that the democrats don't have a dialogue with Beijing," said Joseph Cheng, a professor of political science at the City University of Hong Kong. "In order to have an influence on the government of Hong Kong, they must have legitimacy with Beijing."

In many ways, the democrats are victims of unexpected circumstances. The party won votes by promising to be a bulwark against Chinese interference in Hong Kong. But Beijing has for the most part stayed out of Hong Kong's affairs.

The democrats have also been thrown on their heels by the Asian financial crisis. In the prosperous days before the handover, the Democratic Party espoused the same free-market ideas as the government. But now, with unemployment running at record levels, the younger members are demanding that the party fight for working people.

With Democratic Party leaders like Mr. Lee, a highly paid lawyer, it is not a natural fit. "Despite its grass-roots image, the leaders of the party are quite well-off people," Mr. Cheng said.

After Sunday's meeting, both factions of the party were eager to play down their differences. "People expressed their views frankly, but there were no fireworks, as many expected," Mr. Lee said.

Mr. Lee said the party would remain in the Legislative Council, while at the same time organizing more protests and rallies. "The demonstrations must be well-planned rather than wildcat affairs," he said.

Mr. To said the leaders agreed to work for the interests of working-class as well as middle-class voters. But he added that the meeting did not resolve the deeper questions about the future of Hong Kong's democracy movement.

Cohen, in Japan, Offers Help for Satellite Program

Reuters

TOKYO — Defense Secretary William Cohen reiterated Monday that the United States was prepared to help Japan develop its planned space satellite program and was eager for Tokyo's cooperation on anti-missile defense systems.

Arriving in Tokyo at the start of a weeklong visit to Japan and South Korea to discuss the threat from North Korea and other issues, Mr. Cohen welcomed Japan's announcement, made last month, that it planned to launch four intelligence and other satellites by mid-2003.

"The Japanese government will obviously have to make a decision on whether they wish to try and develop their own satellite system or buy foreign satellite technology," he said to reporters.

"In any event, if they decide to go forward, we will try to help in ways in which we can perhaps share some of our own technology or be of assistance in ways that they would find helpful."

The defense secretary stressed that a completely separate Japanese satellite program "would be quite expensive and complicated." He added, "But that is a decision they will have to make and we will respect that."

Mr. Cohen will meet Prime Minister Keizo Obuchi and Defense Minister Hosoi Norihiro to discuss issues ranging from North Korea to the so-called theater missile defense system. He will also discuss new U.S.-Japan security guidelines before going to South Korea on Thursday.

Violence and Protest Take Hold in Indonesia

Reuters

JAKARTA — The student movement vowed Monday to resume mass protests against President B.J. Habibie as violence spread to more regions of the country.

Student leaders said they would resume the protests after observing the Muslim holidays Jan. 19 and Jan. 20. They are demanding Mr. Habibie's resignation, a trial of former President Suharto and an end to the military's role in politics.

"We will press on until we have a democratic society," said Eli Salomo of Forkort, one of the most radical student groups in Jakarta, at a news conference arranged by eight student groups.

Clashes between students and security forces in November and December came to a halt late last month when students marked the beginning of the Muslim fasting month.

But Ramadan did not blunt spiraling unrest and crime in the archipelago as the economic crisis pushes millions into unemployment and poverty.

About 3,000 people in Sumatra's Lampung Province, some 135 kilometers (80 miles) northwest of Jakarta, stormed a neighboring village, setting fire to cars and looting buildings, angered by the killing of four men suspected of masterminding a string of motorcycle thefts in which several people were murdered.

Violence has also been mounting in the province of Aceh on the northern tip of Sumatra. The military said Monday it had arrested 30 soldiers in Aceh for beating to death and torturing suspected separatist rebels over the weekend.

Military officials and human rights groups said Sunday that four people died, bringing the number of deaths in the province in recent weeks to 20.

"I say this firmly: I cannot justify what happened on Saturday," said Jomay Wahab, the military commander in Lhokseumawe.

"I will investigate the incident thoroughly," he added, "and send the suspects to the military court by the end of the month."

Fires Ravage Freetown as Rebels Attack

Agence France-Press

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone — Bazookas and countless fires raged Monday in eastern districts of Freetown, the capital of Sierra Leone, as soldiers from a helicopter shunting between the city and its airport said.

Military sources, who asked not to be named, said the flames had been started by rebels who had been routed.

General Timothy Shelpidi said that troops of the Nigerian-led intervention force he commands, known as Ecomog, were pushing the rebels back through eastern parts of the city.

"The rebels burn, pillage and kill as they go through," and use civilians as "human shields," General Shelpidi said at the international airport, Lungi, across an estuary from Freetown.

The Revolutionary United Front rebel group and renegade government troops stormed the capital Wednesday and have since been pitted against the soldiers of the West African Ecomog force.

"We've never seen anything like it, even in the worst fighting during 1997 and 1998," a resident said of the fires Monday.

An unidentified Ecomog official said: "There are still small groups of rebels and isolated gunmen. It will take another few days before the city is safe again."

Rebels have also kidnapped two more Italian missionaries by tricking them into believing they could contact an abducted colleague, the Italian ambassador announced here Monday.

The envoy, Luigi Costa Sanseverino Di Bisignano, said the rebels contacted the two missionaries and persuaded them that they would be able to get in touch with their colleague, Mario Guerra, who was kidnapped by insurgents in mid-November.

The missionaries disappeared and have not been heard from since.

Truth Panel Denies Amnesty To Policeman in Biko Beating

By Suzanne Daley
New York Times Service

JOHANNESBURG — A former police officer who said he helped tackle the anti-apartheid activist Steve Biko and smash his head into a wall when Mr. Biko was in custody in 1977 has been denied amnesty by the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission.

The commission has not yet released its findings, but George Bizos, a lawyer for the Biko family, said the panel had ruled that no amnesty could be granted because the police officer had not admitted to a crime.

The officer, Gideon Niewoudt, and the four other officers involved in Mr. Biko's interrogation told the commission that Mr. Biko had attacked them after he had been forced to stand. They said they had been defending themselves when they jumped on him.

Days after the incident, Mr. Biko, naked, disoriented and suffering from severe head injuries, was driven 1,200 kilometers (750 miles) across South Africa for medical treatment. He died before he got any, on Sept. 12, 1977.

His case outraged the world and helped galvanize the anti-apartheid movement. Although an investigation at the time cleared the police officers of any wrongdoing, it became clear that an obviously injured Mr. Biko had spent days manacled to window bars before dying alone on the floor of a prison cell.

What exactly happened to him has been an enduring secret. When the five officers involved in his interrogation applied for amnesty in 1996, many South Africans hoped they would finally hear a full explanation of how Mr. Biko, the founder of the Black Consciousness Movement, had died.

But few were satisfied with the version of events the five police officers put forward during weeks of testimony to the Truth Commission in 1997.

Sidestepping the question of whether Mr. Niewoudt, who is in jail for other crimes, is believable, the commission's decision focuses on an issue that was particularly galling to the Biko family: None of the police officers accepted blame for Mr. Biko's death or confessed to any criminal behavior.

In theory, the verdict leaves Mr. Niewoudt vulnerable to criminal prosecution. But such a prosecution seems unlikely. Legal experts say proving intent to kill for a murder charge would be extremely difficult. And a lesser charge of manslaughter would not be possible because of a 20-year statute of limitations.

Kazakhstan Votes For the Incumbent

ALMATY, Kazakhstan — President Nursultan Nazarbayev has easily won re-election following a race marred by allegations of unfair campaigning and ballot stuffing.

Mr. Nazarbayev, who led Kazakhstan during the Soviet era and became its president at independence in 1991, received 81.7 percent of the vote in Sunday's election, according to preliminary results released by the Central Election Commission.

Opposition leaders and foreign observers said Mr. Nazarbayev assured his own victory long before voting started when he barred two leading candidates, including the former prime minister, Akzhan Kazhegildin, from entering the race because they were arrested for attending an unauthorized meeting.

Mr. Nazarbayev also pushed a motion through Parliament that scheduled elections almost two years earlier than envisioned by the country's constitution. The move denied opponents enough time to mount proper campaigns, observers said. (AP)

Voting took place Saturday in 35 of Nigeria's 36 states with millions of voters turning out to vote for governors and state assemblies.

Voting in one state, Bayelsa, did not take place because of recent clashes between security agents and locals demanding a greater share of oil wealth.

CAMBODIA: Workers Protest Conditions

ment. The European Union took the same step.

At the same time, both the United States and the EU gave many Cambodian goods low-tariff entry under their "generalized system of preferences" for developing countries.

Garment exports earned Cambodia nearly $300 million in the first 10 months of 1998, about one-third of its total export income. Some 70 percent of the apparel sales are to the United States, with the rest going to Europe.

On Monday, in the latest of a series of protests in the past year, more than 1,000 employees of a Malaysian-owned garment factory in Phnom Penh went on strike to demand better overtime pay and working conditions, Reuters reported.

Workers at a PCCS Garments Ltd. factory said their overtime wages had recently been cut to 50 cents an hour from 80 cents.

"We're not going back to work until we get a deal for proper overtime and working conditions," said a 19-year-old employee, who complained that the factory was too hot and poorly ventilated.

Paul Wong, the company's administration manager, called the workers' demands "unreasonable" and denied there was anything wrong with conditions at the factory.

But Mr. Ramsay said that mandatory overtime in Cambodian garment factories was common and rarely paid.

"Protesting workers are fired without notice or compensation," he said. "I hope the American inspectors will be shown the real situation. Human rights must start at the grassroots level, in the village and working place."

The Free Trade Union of Workers of the Kingdom of Cambodia has called on the government to enforce the country's labor laws to ensure an improvement in factory conditions.

Along with the AFL-CIO trade union, it has urged the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative to revoke Cambodia's favorable trade status because of labor abuses and the government's failure to enforce labor laws.

The Cambodian commerce minister, Cham Prasith, said the government was checking working conditions in the garment factories and said violators of labor laws could have their licenses canceled and visas revoked.

But he warned that U.S. quotas could derail the Cambodian garment industry just as it was ready to take off. A further 139 garment factories, which would provide 110,000 new jobs, were recently licensed.

"If they impose quotas on us, how can we attract new investors?" Mr. Cham Prasith asked. "We are a poor country that needs development."

Japan Negotiations Make Progress

TOKYO — Seeking to move closer to a coalition government, Japan's governing party gave in Monday to an opposition demand to no longer allow bureaucrats to speak for ministers in Parliament.

Under the deal between the ruling Liberal Democratic Party and the opposition Liberal Party, ministry bureaucrats will speak only when requested to do so, the Liberal Party official, Takeji Kono, said.

Japanese politicians often read from papers prepared by bureaucrats, whose technical expertise is often superior to that of the politicians. Bureaucrats also answer questions during parliamentary debates.

But many Japanese are increasingly wary of the bureaucrats' domination over policy-making because they are not elected and do not appear to be answerable to public opinion. (AP)

Pakistani Court Halts Executions

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — The Supreme Court on Monday halted executions ordered by military courts in Karachi until it ruled on the validity of the tribunals.

The country's top court issued the interim order while hearing five somewhat similar petitions challenging summary military courts set up by Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif's government.

Chief Justice Ajmal Mian said in a brief order that until the court made a final decision, the government "shall not execute death sentences already awarded by the military courts or which may be awarded hereafter." (Reuters)

Manila Court Gives Rapist New Chance

MANILA — The Supreme Court on Monday gave a convicted rapist one more chance to plead for his life, ordering him to respond to a government petition for his execution.

The high court ordered Leo Echegaray to respond to a government petition asking the court to allow the death sentence against the inmate to be carried out in what would be the first execution in the Philippines in 23 years.

Three hours before Mr. Echegaray was to be executed on Jan. 4, the court ordered a six-month delay to allow Congress to review a law that reimposes the death penalty in the Philippines. (AP)

British Back Sinn Fein On IRA Disarmament

By James F. Clarity
New York Times Service

DUBLIN — After a week of disturbing events that appear to threaten the advance of the Northern Ireland peace effort, Mo Mowlam, the British Northern Ireland secretary, proposed a compromise Monday on the crucial issue of the disarmament of the Irish Republican Army.

Ms. Mowlam, the highest official in the British province, agreed, in effect, with the disarmament position held by Sinn Fein, the political wing of the IRA: that the language of the Belfast peace agreement does not require the IRA to disarm before May 2000.

But she added quickly that she hoped the IRA and Sinn Fein would make some gesture toward disarmament that would allay Protestant fears that the overwhelmingly Roman Catholic republican movement might resume the sectarian war.

The Belfast agreement, approved nine months ago, is to give minority Catholics in the North more political power and to increase the influence of the overwhelmingly Catholic Irish Republic in the British province.

Last month, in a historic act of co-operation, Protestant and Catholic leaders approved the establishment of executive bodies to carry out the power-sharing. But the issue of IRA disarmament has delayed the filling of the new posts.

Sinn Fein's president, Gerry Adams, says that his party merits the immediate appointment of two ministers in the executive body of the new Northern Ireland Assembly, which is to be given powers that have been held by the British government in London since 1974. But the Protestant first minister of the Assembly, David Trimble, insists that the IRA must begin disarming before Sinn Fein is allowed in the executive.

On Sunday, after a week of troubling events related to the peace effort, Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain accelerated efforts to smooth over the disarmament dispute and move toward London's granting of home rule powers to the Assembly by the end of March.

"I just hope," he said in London, "that there exists the initiative and vision on all sides to bring it to fruition."

But there was no sign of this during the holidays. In its New Year's message the IRA noted, ominously in the view of many, that the last time the peace effort was stalled — in its view, by the British government — the IRA ended a 17-month cease-fire in February 1996 and resumed its bombing campaign in England. The current IRA cease-fire has held for 17 months.

Protestant leaders called this statement a threat. Mainstream Catholics, who oppose violence, worried that the Protestants might be right.

Fears of new violence rose in the Irish Republic and the North when a group of heavily armed masked terrorists, believed by the police to be IRA dissidents, tried to rob an armored car carrying the equivalent of $120,000 in the Dublin suburb of Dalkey. The robbery failed when the getaway car stalled. But the terrorists, believed to be trying to finance new attacks, escaped.

A photograph of a masked member of the IRA aiming a rifle adorns a month on the organization's 1999 calendar. The image is regarded by Protestants as an indication of the IRA's reluctance to turn in its weapons.

After the robbery attempt, the investigative sharpened between Protestant unionist leaders and Catholic republicans.

Mr. Trimble suggested that Sinn Fein was using Nazi propaganda tactics to make its case. "It was Josef Goebbels," Mr. Trimble said, "who once said, 'If you tell a big enough lie often enough, then it will be believed.'"

Mr. Adams replied: "Mr. Trimble is deliberately seeking to delay the implementation of the agreement. Indeed, there is an increasing number of republicans and nationalists who are coming round to the view that he is seeking the collapse of the agreement."

To many officials and experts, Mr. Adams seemed to be echoing the implied threat of the IRA to end its cease-fire.

Ms. Mowlam was asked at a news conference on Monday in Lurgan, west of Belfast, whether she thought the Belfast Agreement required the IRA to disarm before May 2000.

"In terms of the words," she said of the language of the agreement, "there are no preconditions" to Sinn Fein's obtaining seats now on the new executive.

"But in terms of the spirit," she added, it was necessary "to build confidence" in "all dimensions." That was widely understood as Ulster speak, the euphemistic political language of the province, to stand for IRA disarmament.

"That means decommissioning," she said. "That means formation of the executive. That means that all of us have got to take another step forward. The finishing line is near."

She added that she would discuss the impasse with Northern Ireland's political leaders this week.

Kosovo Rebels Plan to Free Some Captives

Reuters

GENEVA — The Kosovo Liberation Army said Monday it was planning to free some of the eight Yugoslav army soldiers captured in the Serbian province last week.

"It is unlikely that we will free all of them," Bardhyl Mahmuti, political representative in Europe for the ethnic Albanian separatist group, said in a news conference here. "Some, a minimal number, will be freed."

In return, he said, the Kosovo Liberation Army expects the Serbian authorities to release some of the 2,100 Albanians they are known to hold.

Representatives of Kosovo Serbs said Monday that a state of emergency should be declared in the province and that monitors from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe should be given 24 hours to leave before a major crackdown on the rebels.

The head of the Yugoslav Army, General Dragoljub Ojdanic, arrived Monday in the regional capital, Pristina, the army said, adding that forces had been put on high alert.

The capture of the eight soldiers Friday near Stari Trg, a mining town 40 kilometers (25 miles) northwest of Pristina, has sparked a crisis in and around the province, where international representatives are seeking talks aimed at a political settlement.

Mr. Mahmuti said the eight were not hostages as described by the OSCE. "This is a conflict between two armies. They are prisoners of war," he said. "We could have shot them, but that is not what we want."

He said the guerrillas' main aim was not an exchange of prisoners but to get the Serbs "to stop their policy of wholesale detention of Albanians," and then start talks on a settlement.

Serbian forces "are arresting Albanians at the rate of 400 a month," he said. "We want to have a roundtable, but we can't go to that while this policy of wholesale arrests continues."

Milosevic Denies 'Terrorism'

President Slobodan Milosevic of Yugoslavia said Monday his government would "not tolerate terrorist activities" by Albanian separatists, Agence France-Presse reported from Belgrade.

Mr. Milosevic told the OSCE chairman, Foreign Minister Knut Vollebæk of Norway, that if "world powers still cannot understand that this is terrorism, it is clear that we are faced with open support for the criminal acts against citizens and the state," the official Tanjug news agency said.

Cyprus Mediator Resumes Shuttle

NICOSIA — The United Nations permanent representative on Cyprus, Dame Ann Hercus, had her first meeting Monday with President Glavkos Klerides since Cyprus decided against the deployment of Russian missiles on the island.

After the meeting, Dame Ann made a brief statement to the press, confirming that "shuttle talks have recommenced."

She said she would meet the Turkish Cypriot leader, Rauf Denktash, later in the week, and have another meeting with Mr. Klerides next week. Dame Ann started her shuttle mission in October in a bid to reduce tension on the island and promote a settlement. (AFP)

Munich Prosecutor Acts in Le Pen Case

MUNICH — The Munich prosecutor's office has issued a summons to question Jean-Marie Le Pen, the French extreme-right leader, in France on allegations of inciting hatred, it said Monday.

The announcement concerning Mr. Le Pen, leader of the National Front, was made by Manfred Wick, the prosecutor.

The investigation centers on remarks made by Mr. Le Pen minimizing the Nazi gas chambers as "a detail" of World War II history. Mr. Le Pen is liable for prosecution since the European Parliament stripped him of his parliamentary immunity Oct. 6 following his statement in Munich on Dec. 5, 1997, that the Nazi death camps were a detail of history. Russian U.S. Envoy To Take Up UN Job

UNITED NATIONS, New York — Russia's ambassador to Washington, Yuli Vorontsov, is to take up a United Nations post with responsibility for conflict resolution after his retirement at the end of this month, a UN spokesman said Monday.

The spokesman confirmed that Mr. Vorontsov, who previously served as chief delegate to the UN for his country, would have the rank of UN undersecretary-general and would be employed on a "dollar-a-year" basis as needed. (AFP)

Schroeder Calls for Calm in EU Scandal

By John Schmid
International Herald Tribune

BONN — Chancellor Gerhard Schröder on Monday began working on the challenges facing Germany in its six-month European Union presidency by pushing for a calm resolution to the furor in Brussels that threatens to undermine the EU's executive branch.

Mr. Schröder pleaded for a "stable and functional" European Commission to achieve by March what he called a "very ambitious" overhaul of the EU's complex system of finances.

He met Monday with the 20-member commission in Bonn just as the European Parliament in Strasbourg began debate on a censure motion that could force all 20 commissioners to resign over allegations of mismanagement. A vote is due Thursday.

Even if the vote fails, as expected, the commission could become a weakened body, diplomats warn.

"I plead not only to look backwards but also to look forwards, and that means getting agreement on the agenda and avoiding stuttering in Europe's engine," Mr. Schröder said. "Bringing Europe forward is more important than irritations that might be related to mutual misunderstandings."

Bonn has called a special EU summit meeting in March to negotiate a complete overhaul of the EU budget. Mr. Schröder promised in his campaign to cut its heavy payments to the EU, and a potentially bitter conflict looms with Europe's militant farm lobbies over plans to reduce EU agriculture subsidies. Bonn pays more than 20 billion Deutsche marks ($11.82 billion) more into Brussels coffers than it receives, making it by far the largest net payer.

Mr. Schröder threw his support behind the creation of a special EU anti-corruption unit that would investigate the allegations, helping open the door to a solution to the censure motion. "The charges should be addressed," Mr. Schröder said.

"We in the presidency need a stable and functional commission because of the solution for the difficult tasks that I sketched out, and we will do all we can to achieve that," said Mr. Schröder as he appeared with Jacques Santer, president of the commission. Mr. Schröder's comments gave Mr. Santer a potentially powerful supporter at the start of a difficult week.

The meeting on Monday began what will be a bout of furious diplomacy around Europe for Mr. Schröder and his cabinet. If he succeeds with his agenda, he could step into the role of European power broker vacated by his predecessor as chancellor, Helmut Kohl.

The Kremlin Doctor and the Sick Toe

By Daniel Williams
Washington Post Service

MOSCOW — With eyes that had seen it all before, the retired surgeon attentively scanned the televised face of President Boris Yeltsin the other day. The puffs. The slow speech. Sedatives? "It's hard to say without a full medical report," she said cautiously.

"We've experienced at keeping leaders alive. Also at keeping secrets." Praskovya Moshentseva worked at the Central Kremlin Hospital, which for decades provided care for the Soviet elite. At 85, she is a strongbox of strange and formerly hidden tales. She once operated on the foot of a patient whose body was otherwise hidden by heavy curtains. As she worked on an abscess of the big toe, she asked if it hurt. An anonymous attendant pushed her in the back to command silence. The patient moaned.

Only two and a half years later was Dr. Moshentseva told that the toe belonged to Stalin.

So the secrecy surrounding the health of Russia's current failing leader is no surprise to her. During one recent bout of illness, presidential spokesmen announced in rapid succession that Mr. Yeltsin suffered from a cold, bronchitis, pneumonia, exhaustion and nothing at all. In 1996, when Mr. Yeltsin suffered a series of cardiac crises, doctors put out deceptive statements about his health to keep his re-election campaign on track.

"When I worked at the hospital, it was expected that we wouldn't look into a room unless the patient there was ours," she said. "It was dangerous to overhear conversations. We didn't want to know. Some things don't change."

Dr. Moshentseva lives in a modest, orderly apartment near the Moscow River. Last year, her memoirs, "Secrets of the Kremlin Hospital," were published. The hospital is still the place where Mr. Yeltsin and other top officials go for occasional health problems. However, Mr. Yeltsin's open-heart surgery in November 1996 took place in the city's main cardiac-care center.

Sometimes Dr. Moshentseva's candid recollections bring to mind the old warning that a cure can be worse than the disease. Of Leonid Brezhnev, who, like Mr. Yeltsin, ruled from the Kremlin while dogged by declining health and mounting drinking problems, she said: "A lot of mistakes were made on him. He was high-strung, and doctors gave him sedatives. Hypnosis would have been better."

She met Mr. Brezhnev in the 1960s when she was called to his country home to treat a hand cut. The Communist general secretary had fallen from a tree while hunting moose. "He was full of strength and vigor," she wrote.

Several years later, when she met him again, his speech was "blurred, and he looked like a hurt child." He received mysterious injections. "Indeed, there was a special nurse attached to him who made special injections. I ask myself the question, 'If a nurse was giving him something wrong, why did nobody interfere?'"

Yuri Andropov, who ruled the Soviet Union briefly in the early 1980s, suffered from ailing kidneys secretly for almost a decade before his death in 1984. "They gave him periodic dialysis treatments — once a week sometimes,"

She met Mr. Brezhnev in the 1960s when she was called to his country home to treat a hand cut. The Communist general secretary had fallen from a tree while hunting moose.

Dr. Moshentseva recalled. "They didn't dare transplant; they couldn't guarantee success. It wasn't the kidneys that finally got him, exactly. He went to the south, bathed in the sea, the water was cold, he got sick. This time, they failed to save him."

She is ambivalent about the extreme lengths to which Moscow doctors have gone to keep ailing leaders not merely alive but in office. "It is a political question. The leaders have strong will; it is hard to get them to let go," she said. "On the other hand, our country is large and complicated. What Russia truly needs is healthy leadership."

Singers, rocket scientists, spies —

Dr. Moshentseva treated them all until she retired in 1981. Nikita Khrushchev, hospitalized with heart problems, once told her that everything in Pravda, the official Communist Party newspaper, was rubbish.

Yet, if you ask for her strongest career memory, she does not mention the all-star lineup of patients. Rather, she tells of an odd night in Moscow when a violent storm knocked a tree onto a woman who was then brought to the hospital. "She had a fractured skull. The guards wanted to call an ambulance, but I said she was too hurt. She needed help immediately. It was against the rules. I expected to be fired, but I did it anyway."

"The old woman recovered consciousness and asked where she was. I told her the Kremlin Hospital and she screamed with horror. 'I've come to the Devil's lair! The Devil!' It turned out, she was a nun earlier in her life. When she recuperated, I offered her a certificate to explain her condition. She ripped it up. 'It's a note from the Antichrist,' she said. Still, she kissed my feet when she left."

"When I was a young woman, before I was admitted to medical school, times were difficult in Russia. I needed a place to stay. An old woman took me in. I was an orphan; my mother had given me up. Like I said, times were hard, and lots of parents could not feed their children. When I was released from the orphanage, I had no place to go."

Dr. Moshentseva began to cry. "The old woman rescued me from hunger. She worked making tapestries, and I played my guitar for her. I learned she was a nun. So you see, there were two nuns in my life. One saved me, and I saved one."

America's Role in Iraq

From the information so far disclosed about U.S. intelligence activities in Iraq, it does not appear that Washington acted improperly or misused the United Nations. But it is clear that the international effort to monitor Iraq's development of unconventional weapons will not resume in the form used over the last seven years.

That obliges the United States and its allies to develop new methods to prevent Saddam Hussein from stockpiling chemical and biological agents. U.S. spying in Iraq supported and was coordinated with the UN weapons inspection program, which began after the Gulf War in 1991. It was designed to locate sites where toxic weapons were being developed or stored, and to identify buildings that housed records about such arms.

To overcome elaborate Iraqi concealment schemes, UN inspectors needed U.S. assistance, including sophisticated eavesdropping devices that could intercept the radio and telephone communications of Baghdad's security services. U.S. officials say the effort was approved by top UN inspectors and that the intelligence data was shared with them. That is a critical issue, for an effort to deceive the UN or to conduct independent U.S. espionage operations under UN cover would have abused Washington's relationship with the organization.

The most sensitive U.S. operation began last March, when an American spy serving as a UN inspector traveled to Baghdad to install especially advanced listening equipment. If this operation was authorized by the UN team, and employed for its benefit, as U.S. officials say it was, the effort was a perfectly reasonable response to Iraq's attempts to thwart the inspectors.

With the encouragement of Iraq and its friends, the Security Council is now arguing over the U.S. role rather than dealing with the urgent issue of how to prevent Saddam from rearming. Richard Butler, who has done a commendable job as the chief UN inspector, should not be sacrificed nor should his team be dismantled. Secretary-General Kofi Annan must resist the notion that Washington and Mr. Butler somehow conspired to wrong Iraq.

Coming up with new ways to deal with Iraq will not be easy, but several principles are paramount. Baghdad must not be allowed to build a new arsenal of unconventional weapons or threaten neighbors with them. Lifting the oil embargo, a move favored by Russia and France, would be a grave mistake, giving Saddam an unlimited revenue stream that he would undoubtedly use for military purposes. The United States and Britain, however, have little support they receive on the Security Council, must not waver in their commitment to restrain Iraq.

Spending the U.S. Surplus

Maybe money can buy the bipartisan support that has been so sorely missing from national politics. A number of suggestions have been made in recent days about ways to tap the budget surplus that might satisfy the agendas of both parties. The ideas are all still vague — not so much a slicing of the pie as the mention of some possible slices. Some are familiar and, in our view, improvident, but not all are bad.

One trial balloon involves Social Security. The president would very much like the record of his years in office to include a deal that would put the giant program on a sound financial footing. Aides doubt a deal can be struck with Republicans that does not include some form of partial "privatization" or reliance on individual investment accounts for a share of retirement income. But there is equal pressure from many Democrats, organized labor and much of the elder lobby not to set up such accounts as the core retirement program's expense.

As a possible compromise, White House officials have begun to explore using part of the surplus to set up retirement accounts that officially would be separate from Social Security. The accounts, to which individuals might be free to add, would provide an additional tier of retirement income. The diversion to the accounts of what otherwise would become government funds could be phrased as a tax cut, thereby helping to meet another Republican goal. The accounts could be set up in such a way as to help the neediest most, which would be good policy and help attract support from Democrats as well.

Social Security would then be put on a firmer financial footing through a combination of conventional means — imposing benefit cuts and finding additional sources of revenue. Benefits would be lower at the end of the process, but the structure of the program — the promise and obligation of the government to provide a basic benefit in the event of retirement, disability or other threats to earnings — would remain. The effect of the benefit cut also would be less by virtue of the individual accounts, separate though they would be in theory. Nor might all the surplus be consumed this way; there would be funds left over for other public purposes. Not bad, either structurally or politically, if they can make the math work; we'll see.

A couple of congressional balloons were also floated in the last few days. The new House speaker, Dennis Hastert, held out an olive branch to Democrats. As part of the Democratic response in kind, the minority whip, David Bonior, said compromise ought to be possible on a number of issues, thanks in part to the surplus. He imagined a tax cut bill that would include a reduction in the so-called marriage penalty, a Republican goal, together with the president's proposed sub-

Fraud at the EU

That there is a systematic fraud in Brussels will not have come as a surprise to many. But the EU's response to the latest disclosures has astounded even its fiercest opponents. The commission has shown itself to be tolerant of corruption, but intolerant of criticism. It now falls to the European Parliament to determine whether the EU, as a whole, can retain any integrity.

The scandal focuses on the revelation of malpractice in a series of projects, including training, tourism, humanitarian aid and the "Med" program, which channels funds to southern Europe. Officials have embezzled money, falsified accounts and dispensed grants in return for bribes. Not only has the commission turned a blind eye, but there is evidence that it has deliberately frustrated police investigations.

On Thursday, MEPs will vote on whether to dismiss the commission. What is left of the EU's reputation now hangs on their vote.

Dissatisfaction With Government Is an Early Warning

By Joseph S. Nye Jr.

SINGAPORE — Confidence in government began to decline in the United States long before the current impeachment of President Bill Clinton. In 1964, three-quarters of the American public said that they trusted the federal government to do the right thing most of the time. In recent years, depending on the poll, only a quarter to a third do so.

The numbers are only slightly better for state and local government. And government is not alone. Over the past three decades, public confidence has fallen by more than half for many major institutions: 61 percent to 30 percent for universities; 55 percent to 21 percent for major companies; 73 percent to 29 percent for medicine; and 29 percent to 14 percent for journalism.

Whatever the symptoms, one would not worry about causes if the consequences did not matter. The United States has always had a mistrust of government. Part of the current problem may be that American expectations of government became too high after World War II.

Moreover, at the underlying constitutional level, the public opinion polls are still positive. If you ask Americans what is the best place in the world to live, 80 percent say the United States. If you ask them whether they like their democratic system of government, 90 percent approve.

If one looks at the Eurobarometer polls in Europe, even in those countries where there is a decline in confidence in government, 90 percent are "satisfied with a democratic form of government." We are not experiencing the alleged "crisis of democracy" popularized in the 1970s. At the constitutional regime level, the current situation is not like France in 1968 — much less 1789! Most people do not feel that the system is rotten and has to be overthrown.

Nonetheless, there remains a case for concern, and not just in the United States. First, in a one-superpower world, major changes in the United States are of direct interest to other countries. Second, the changes in the United States may be harbingers for other countries. At this stage, we cannot be sure. The evidence is spotty and anecdotal.

Polls in different countries often ask somewhat different questions. In a pair of polls taken in 11 European countries in 1981 and in 1990, confidence in government institutions declined in six (Norway, Sweden, Belgium, France, Italy and Spain); was mixed in four (Germany, Iceland, Britain, the Netherlands); and rose in Denmark. Polls in Canada show a decline similar to that in the United States. In Japan, polls show a low regard for politicians throughout the postwar period. More recently, there has been a decline in confidence in the Japanese bureaucracy as well.

A survey of 43 countries in 1981 and 1990 found that people in low income societies accept governmental authority more readily than do citizens of wealthier societies. So understanding the causes of the decline of American confidence in government is important beyond the nation's borders and should stimulate more comparative investigation in other countries.

Ironically, at a time when the United States and the West are celebrating victory in the Cold War, confidence in many Western governments seems to be declining.

There are differences of degree between loss of confidence, dissatisfaction, cynicism, and hatred. But what is the connection between them? Does low confidence tend to become cumulative? If politicians and the press repeat as conventional wisdom that government cannot do anything right, does that breed cynicism?

Business experts talk of "demarketing campaigns" in which consumers are urged not to buy certain products. Since President Jimmy Carter's campaign of 1976, American presidential candidates have tended to "run against Washington." Now most politicians do.

Studies show that over the past three decades, the media and films have tended to portray politics and government with a much more negative slant. This might not matter if the only casualty were the vanity of politicians. But over long periods, devaluation of government and politics could affect the strength of democratic institutions.

Social scientists do not fully understand the relationship between satisfaction with day to day government and support for democracy. Yet one thing is clear: the future of democratic governance and its ability to respond to an information age matter very much.

In Today's Iran, Writing Is a Dangerous Occupation

By K. Anthony Appiah

CAMBRIDGE, Massachusetts

— Last month, two Iranian writers — Mohammed Mokhtari, a poet and literary critic, and Mohammed Jafar Pouyandeh, an essayist and translator — were murdered. Iran's official news agency published a statement from the Information Ministry last week saying the killers were "irresponsible colleagues of this ministry."

Mr. Mokhtari and Mr. Pouyandeh were among a group of seven writers summoned last October to appear before a "revolutionary court," which ordered them to cease their efforts to form an independent writers' association because it constituted a threat to national security.

Their murders came two weeks after two opposition politicians, Dariush Foruhar and his wife, Parvaneh Eskandari, along with Majid Sharif, a translator and journalist, were killed. The Information Ministry has also admitted involvement in their deaths.

Before these terrible crimes, there were signs that Iran might be restructuring. Mohammed Khatami, a moderate cleric who had once resigned from a government post to protest censorship, was elected president in 1997 with 70 percent of the vote. After the election, independent newspapers sprouted up; Farzad Sarkhul, a journalist, was released from prison; Mr. Khatami vowed not to carry out the death sentence against Salman Rushdie, and groups of athletes, tourists and academics began traveling to and from Iran.

Why, then, have writers become targets? The trouble begins with the balance of power within Iran's government. Conservative clerics, led by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who ranks above the elected president in the theocratic republic and controls the judiciary, armed forces and Information Ministry, have the power and the will to resist Mr. Khatami's modest attempts at liberalization. And, with a growing secular movement in Iran, they have become increasingly nervous that their grasp on power might soon slip away.

Next month, city and provincial elections mandated by the Iranian Constitution 20 years ago will be held for the first time, and moderates are expected to prevail. February also marks the 20th anniversary of the revolution that overthrew the shah, leading many Iranians to question the direction it has taken. These murders can be seen as the hard-liners' latest challenge to Mr. Khatami's authority.

Mr. Mokhtari and Mr. Pouyandeh, secular writers with no government or religious ties, made attractive targets. They first came under scrutiny in October 1994, when they signed the Declaration of 134, which announced plans for a new independent writers' association. Four of the signers have since died in mysterious circumstances, and many more have been harassed and interrogated.

In the past, Iran's security police were content to arrest their targets, torture them and extract false confessions. But as control over prisons has shifted toward Mr. Khatami, it seems extremists are resorting to assassination.

Most Iranians yearn for basic freedoms, and Mr. Mokhtari and Mr. Pouyandeh have become martyrs to this simple but historic desire. We must not forget them. Nor should we forget the surviving signatories to the Declaration of 134.

Writers have only one weapon in the struggle to defend the right to free speech: more words. That truth was brought home poignantly when Mr. Mokhtari's widow placed a pen in his coffin.

The U.S. Has Many Policies on Iraq, but None Is Working

By Fred Hiatt

WASHINGTON — Some accuse the Clinton administration of lacking a policy toward Iraq. This is unfair. It has many.

There is the policy of overthrowing Saddam Hussein, as embodied in the Iraq Liberation Act that authorized $97 million to train and equip Iraqi opposition groups. President Bill Clinton signed that bill into law in October, and in November he promised to "intensify" U.S. cooperation with anti-Saddam organizations.

There is the policy explicated by Mr. Clinton's commander in chief of the Gulf forces, General Anthony Zinni, who said last week that his primary mission was to provide stability. "I would not be in favor of anything that destabilizes the situation in the region," he said. How that squares with fomenting a coup is not clear.

There is the policy of disarming Iraq. It was because Saddam kicked out United Nations weapons inspectors that Mr. Clinton finally authorized a three-day bombing campaign last month.

The inspectors are still shut out. The bombing damaged Iraq's missiles but probably not the biological weapons they would carry. Knowledgeable experts say Iraq would need only about six unmonitored months to cook up such weapons. Five have elapsed since UN inspectors got the boot.

Maintaining an international consensus on Iraq was a policy the U.S. administration put much stock in. Beginning in November 1997, it cited this goal every time it retreated from a confrontation with Saddam.

When U.S. planes finally went into action, only the British flew alongside. Russia and China bailed out long ago. Prime Minister Lionel Jospin of France last week criticized America's "unilateral" behavior — though, as Secretary of State Madeleine Albright pointed out, none of these critics had proposed a better alternative for disarming Saddam. Far from leading a consensus, the United States now may have to wield its veto against a consensus building on the other side.

And then there's "containment." Under this policy, the United States enforces its no-fly zones, maintains economic sanctions and stands ready to bomb again anytime Saddam tries to rebuild his biological, chemical or nuclear weapons capabilities.

The administration believes this policy is working well. "We feel pretty comfortable about where we are," a State Department spokesman, James Foley, said last week. Saddam is "an increasingly desperate man," Mr. Foley added. General Zinni cited "significant internal problems in Iraq" and "fairly desperate attempts to try to regain some of that position he held before, or thought he held before."

Signs of that desperation, according to U.S. officials, are Iraq's efforts to shoot down U.S. jets in the no-fly zone, Saddam's taunting of fellow Arab leaders, a reshuffle of his top command and reports that he has executed many internal enemies in recent days.

U.S. officials may know more, and may be doing more, than they can say. But if Saddam is not teetering, if administration analyses contain some element of wishful thinking, the question becomes how long a strategy of "containment" can be sustained.

It is true that the United States can veto indefinitely any effort by the UN Security Council to lift economic sanctions. But it cannot force the rest of the world to abide by them if most nations come to see them as outdated and unfair.

Similarly, U.S. intelligence can monitor broad developments in Saddam's weapons program — the rebuilding of a missile repair facility, say. It may, with some delay and luck, track the import of suspicious materials. But UN inspectors in Iraq could not find all of Saddam's poison weapons; at a distance, U.S. intelligence will not, either.

This unstable status quo is at the root of the continuing conflict between the administration and the UN secretary-general, Kofi Annan, or at least some of his advisers. Efforts by some in his entourage to torpedo the UN inspectorate, or UNSCOM, with malicious leaks are shameful. But Mr. Annan's efforts to come up with a new policy framework — an "Uncom-2" — are understandable. This is not "Uncom-Lite," its advocates insist, but rather some kind of grand bargain that would promise Iraq a real chance at economic recovery in exchange for real weapons monitoring.

Unfortunately, that was pretty much the grand bargain envisaged by Uncom-1; Saddam could easily have had sanctions lifted had he cooperated with UN inspectors. He showed instead that he would keep his weapons of mass destruction at any cost. So it is hard to imagine Uncom-2 not ending up as a pretense — a willingness to sign off on incomplete disarmament.

The truth is that there are no good options on Iraq. As long as Saddam rules, total disarmament will not happen. One response is to show some "realism" — let him keep some weapons, and move on. Another is to engineer his overthrow, but few of the hawks in Congress who back that solution rhetorically also back the use of force it most likely would require.

That leaves the administration somewhere in between, still test-marketing a range of sometimes contradictory policies, claiming more success than seems warranted and clinging for now to a containment that may or may not hold.

This Impeachment Fails Test of 1868

By James Reston Jr.

CHEVY CHASE, Maryland — In the past few months, Bill Clinton has often been compared to Andrew Johnson, who came within one vote of being impeached by the Senate. By that measure, can Representative Henry Hyde, the chief prosecutor in the Senate trial, be compared to Thaddeus Stevens, who as leader of the Radical Republicans pushed the hardest for the impeachment of President Johnson?

So far, if Mr. Hyde aspires to the stature of Stevens, he has failed miserably at the task. Stevens was a champion of abolition and an advocate for black suffrage. He saw Andrew Johnson, whose priority was the speedy restoration of the Confederate states with the Union, as the undoer of Reconstruction principles.

Officially, Johnson was being impeached for violating the Tenure of Office Act in firing the Secretary of War and for denouncing Congress as unfit to legislate. But those reasons masked the issues that were more important to the Radical Republicans. Johnson had vetoed 20 Reconstruction bills, and he had urged Southern legislatures to reject the 14th Amendment, which guarantees equal protection of the laws.

Stevens, who was near death when he brought the impeachment articles to the Senate, had no reason to temper his rhetoric. He called Johnson "the nightmare that crouched on the heaving breast of the nation" and "a double skinned rhinoceros."

As the leader of today's impeachment radicals, Mr. Hyde needs to be as forthcoming as Stevens was about his personal reasons for pushing to impeach. Historians and the public in general will want to know why Mr. Hyde has fought so hard to flout the beliefs of most Americans.

Mr. Hyde's rhetoric needs more of Stevens's passion. (Mr. Hyde's banal phrase, that Congress needed to pursue impeachment to "catch the falling flag," will not do.)

Stevens openly acknowledged the political motives behind the impeachment drive. If Congress didn't impeach Johnson, Stevens said to an interviewer during the proceedings, "we are damned to all eternity."

"There is a moral necessity for it, for which I care something, and there is a party necessity for it, for which I care more," Stevens said. "In fact, the party necessity is the moral necessity."

But harsh words from Johnson's supporters did not deter Stevens any more than recent polls and angry Democrats have deterred Mr. Hyde. When Stevens rose to present the last article of impeachment to the full House, his voice was sickly.

"Unfortunate man!" he railed at Johnson, "thus surrounded, hampered, tangled in the meshes of his own wickedness — unfortunate, unhappy man, behold your doom." But Johnson escaped the doom that Stevens had prescribed for him. (Two months after the failed Senate impeachment vote, Stevens was dead.)

Unlike today's congressmen, who are sensitive about charges of vengeance and outraged that history may judge them poorly, Stevens accepted and even welcomed that possibility. History holds Stevens responsible for the pathology of hatred that hovered over the 1868 impeachment.

History will judge modern radicals just as sternly. The principles at stake today pale by comparison to those in 1868. Neither grand history nor profiles in courage nor great biography will emerge from this spectacle.

1899: New Cab

PARIS — The first "landauers" of the Compagnie Générale des Voitures were placed on the Paris boulevards for hire yesterday [Jan. 11]. They are a sort of semi-landau, with a hood of black leather, completely closed, giving the appearance of a coupé, and in profile that of a heavy victoria. A reporter endeavored to hail one, but all he got from the driver was a smile of contempt, like that of a cabman going off duty. The carriage has changed, but the man is the same in another garb.

ROME — A lion cub presented recently to Signor Mussolini has been sent to Milan. In the letter which accompanies it to the Mayor of Milan the Premier says: "I am sending you a young lion. He is a Fascist and, consequently, indomitable."

Place him in the cage which is now free, I believe, and where once the puma delighted the hearts of soldiers and servant girls."

1949: Baby Parson

LOS ANGELES — The world's youngest marrying parson, four-year-old Marjorie Gortner, returned to his red fire engine and drums after preaching to his first big-city revival meeting in the Philharmonic Auditorium. A crowd of 3,000 paid attention as the curly-haired boy evangelist exhorted them to get religion. It was Marjorie's first appearance since he married a young couple at Long Beach January 2. Dressed in a black velvet suit and white boots, Marjorie swung into sermon after entertaining the gathering by swinging a baton and singing "I Better Get Ready," words and music by Marjorie Gortner.

OPINION/LETTERS

America's Loyalty Blotter Marches On to His Shame

By William Safire

WASHINGTON — I love a mystery: What inspires the phenomenal loyalty to Bill Clinton?

There he stands in the dock, impeached as a perjurer, certain of more censure, roundly denounced by even political allies for weaknesses that dishonored his office. Yet not one of the aides who call themselves betrayed has turned on him. Not one of his appointees has resigned in disgust. Not one close associate or lawyer still living has crumbled, though under intense pressure of the threat of jail, to testify against him.

Through all the revelations of deceit, his wife steadfastly grasps his hand. His political party marches lockstep down the line to protect him. And the public, in opinion polls and at the polling booth, stands by him more staunchly with each step toward historic shame. That is loyalty across the board, the likes of which America has never seen before. What's behind it?

Because his personal approval rating is far below his job approval rating, most of us have assumed that his support is strictly the product of rampant prosperity. It seems as if the majority is saying, "we're all right, Jack, and don't rock the boat."

But I have begun to wonder. Good times cannot explain it all. What, for example, undergirds the grim loyalty of Susan Mc-

Dougal or makes Webster Hubbell "just have to roll over again"? Without a powerful psychological tie, they would have cracked years ago. Or what motivates Harold Ickes, coolly stifled by Bill Clinton for the promotion to chief of staff, but still determinedly disremembering dirty dealings that might implicate the president?

What beyond stubbornness drives Janet Reno, losing professional respect and her own health, to cling to office longer than any attorney general this century? What beyond a sense of duty induces William Cohen, who jumped party ship to impeach Richard Nixon, to remain at the helm of the Pentagon and bear the scorn of critics who see his Iraqi missile-lobbying as Clinton impeachment-lobbying?

That is only the beginning of the loyalty mystery. Hillary Clinton told an interviewer a year ago that if her husband were proved to be lying, that would be "a serious offense." After evidence forced him to admit it, she found the offense less serious. Blind love? Shared political goals? Joint vast-conspiracy hatred? Or old-fashioned loyalty?

Now to the enigma within. Two out of three Americans, a far higher percentage than those who voted for the president, are willing to abide with him even if the charges are true. Why? Some do not want to deal with public unpleasantness. Others do not want snoops prying into their own private lives. Others retain a reverence for the presidency, no matter what the leader or sibling-figure does. Add these to the hardcore liberals and minorities who see their man as a fire wall against spreading lava from the right.

But there must be something else — in some undiscovered region from which no media biggie reports — to explain the incredible attachment of this great nation to this ungreat man.

Could it be the Kulturkampf with its weapons of messy personal destruction? In this social conflict, moralizing geezers say to boomers,

"You see where all your '60s pot and protest and permissiveness have brought us?" and graying boomers reply, "Get a life and swing a little, Grampa." Meanwhile, the Self-Abused Generation, living in surplus, pages itself on cell phones and is oblivious to such squabbling among its buying-powerless elders.

Only partly. Could it also be partly that those victorious a generation ago in overturning an election are infuriated by any comparison of cover-ups?

To prevent a "payback time" that would de-demonize Richard Nixon, the aging Good Guys of yesterday are impelled to loyalty minimize Bill Clinton's crimes. The solution to the Clinton loyalty mystery is greater than the sun of these partys. Peeling this onion down to its tears, you discover a widespread affection for this likable lame-duck liar as fervent as a minority's distaste for him. His many weaknesses become his strength.

Loyalty, we discover, need not be a two-way street. Mr. Clinton is a loyalty blotter; he sops it up. He is impervious to calumny because he is confident of that loyalty, which multiplies it. Even as reckoning looms, nothing sticks to him except the majority.

Too Bad Castro's Fastball Failed to Dazzle the Scout

By Tina Rosenberg

NEW YORK — Cuban and American leaders are pondering the issue of whether a Baltimore Orioles visit to Cuba would strengthen or weaken the regime of Fidel Castro.

The question seems improbable, yet governments have long used baseball to promote their values and politics. When the Sandinistas took power in sym-when his 8-year-old son had brain surgery was fired.

Baseball stadiums in Nicaragua in the mid-1980s looked like American ballparks before the days of Beanie Baby giveaways and exploding scoreboards. In the Heroes and Martyrs of September stadium in Leon, Nicaragua's second-largest city, signs advertised Coke and beer, vendors sold hot dogs and the announcers hawked local restaurants.

Nicaragua's best player was Julio Medina, captain of the national team and Sandinista icon. Before the revolution, he had grown up cheering for the Cincinnati Reds, but when a scout for the Reds offered him a contract in 1984, he said, essentially: No thanks, I'd rather be an agronomist.

"The leaders of the revolution and in sports want to form a new bol-crazed Nicaragua in 1979, they considered banning the sport. Instead, they decided they could use it to help build the New Socialist Man.

They began with Managua's 30,000-seat stadium, called "Anastasio Somoza Garcia" after the father of the dynasty the Sandinistas overthrew. They renamed the stadium for the man who shot him.

Anti-American governments love to use the symbol of America as a political canvas. Baseball was exported to Mexico by American railroad engineers, to Japan by missionaries and to Panama by canal builders.

An American consul created the first Nicaraguan team in 1905. Baseball's empire encompasses mainly countries that have spent long periods in America's grip.

Resentment and revolution also flower in these environments, one reason Cuba, Nicaragua and the Dominican Republic have all had governments that might want the Yankees to win, but certainly want the Yanquis to lose.

And although foreign fans, especially Dominicans, treat their major-league players as national heroes, many also resent a baseball relationship that has mirrored America's economic and political practices abroad, with the gringos raiding the best players and then claiming their tournament as the World Series.

In Japan, besuboru is designed to reinforce the values of selflessness, obedience to authority, hard work and loyalty. Robert Whiting, who has written books on Japanese ball, notes that players practice to near-collapse. A players' strike is inconceivable, and few players even change teams or demand high salaries. A superstar American player who took leave from his Japanese team man, both as a professional and as a sportsman," he told me at the time. Biology student by day, member of the Sandinista Youth, he even turned down the per diem players received when traveling abroad.

Governments have long used baseball to promote their values and politics.

When I watched him play, he shook hands with the opposing players when he reached their bases. At one point he tagged out a player trying to steal second, and as the player walked away, Julio Medina shook his hand.

For Havana, the Olympic gold medals won by Cuba's baseball players help show the superiority of socialism. Players who want to pitch for the Yankees must come to America by raft. But pre-revolutionary Cuba had minor-league teams. One American scout, Joe Cambria of the Washington Senators, lived in Havana.

Fidel Castro, who pitched (right-handed) at the University of Havana, had two tryouts with the Senators but was rejected — good slider, mediocre fastball. Baseball will not bring his regime to an end. But had the Senators' scout been more patient with a developing prospect, baseball might have prevented it.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Sierra Leone 'Peacekeeping'

Regarding "The Children of Sierra Leone" (Opinion, Jan. 9):

The editorial is correct to emphasize the plight of Sierra Leone's children, but it places too much trust in the Nigerian-led intervention force supporting President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah.

The Economic Community of West African States has supported Nigeria's bid to reinstall Mr. Kabbah politically, but the subregional organization has never provided the necessary financial and logistical support. As a result, Nigeria has funded its military activities in part through plunder. Whether Nigeria resorted to such actions by necessity or by design, the West African "peacekeeping" force was less effective than it otherwise might have been.

The United Nations Security Council

must accept a great deal of "credit" for allowing such a scenario to develop. Over the past five years it has progressively sought to subcontract the promotion of peace and security to regional organizations under the guise of Chapter VIII of the UN Charter. Thus, the council appears to be doing something when in fact it is doing nothing.

The brightest prospect for Sierra Leone's children, adults, and future generations is for the Security Council to provide the appropriate means to deal with a difficult but not unmanageable situation.

The council's present reliance on regional and subregional organizations is inappropriate and deleterious.

Like-Minded, Longtime Allies

Regarding "British Foreign Policy Remains Based on Two Illusions" (Opinion, Jan. 6) by Roy Denman:

The writer's account of Britain as a "poodle" of the United States is a caricature. What holds Britain back in its relationship with "Euroland" is its wholly different economic and legal philosophy.

British economic policy is more effective in delivering full employment, low inflation and foreign investment. Euroland, despite its average 10 percent unemployment and uneconomic cost of labor, remains stubbornly unconvinced. The same goes for maintaining international law and order, hence Britain's inability to persuade its EU partners to take action in Yugoslavia and more recently in Iraq.

In both these respects, Britain is closer to the United States. It is not a question of sycophancy but of a long history of commerce in an atmosphere of freedom that links Britain and America.

Mentor of Netanyahu Seeks to Unseat Him

Arens Joins Fight for Likud Nomination

By Lee Hockstader
Washington Post Service

JERUSALEM — Moshe Arens, an elder statesman of Israeli politics who plucked Benjamin Netanyahu from obscurity 17 years ago and tirelessly promoted his career, announced Monday that he would try to topple his old protégé as the Likud bloc's nominee for prime minister in the May elections.

The declaration by Mr. Arens, who quit public life in 1992 after serving as foreign minister, defense minister and ambassador to Washington, stunned the conservative Likud, already in crisis following the resignation of two prominent members and fears of further high-level defections. And it injected an atmosphere verging on Greek tragedy into a political season already packed with drama and suspense.

"I have been friendly with Benjamin Netanyahu for many years," Mr. Arens, 73, said, adding, "and it is true my relations with him, because of the age gap, were in many ways like those of father to son. But that doesn't change the situation the Likud is in now."

Lacking money and a political organization, the hawkish Mr. Arens is given little chance of unseating Mr. Netanyahu as Likud's leader and nominee for prime minister in the Jan. 25 party primaries. Nonetheless, his announcement reinforced a general impression within the party that Mr. Netanyahu is in a weak position as the campaign unfolds for May 17 elections.

"If we do not manage to cure the present crisis in the Likud and stop the hemorrhaging of our top people from the party, our chances for winning the elections are not good," Mr. Arens told a news conference in Tel Aviv.

Mr. Arens, unlike some major figures in the party, has refrained from criticizing Mr. Netanyahu's performance as prime minister since he was elected in 1996, and he avoided any personal attacks Monday. Similarly, Mr. Netanyahu, who was a furniture salesman in 1982 when Mr. Arens hired him to be political counselor in the Israeli Embassy in Washington, shielded away from the sort of slashing attacks that he has used against other adversaries.

"I can assure you that I have no doubt that I will receive the overwhelming support of the Likud voters in the Likud primaries and indeed of the citizens of Israel," Mr. Netanyahu said. He said Israelis "know that when it comes to protecting Jerusalem, protecting our security and negotiating the best arrangement for Israel, the person who will do it is me."

Mr. Arens is the second prominent figure within Likud to challenge Mr. Netanyahu for the party leadership. The other is Uzi Landau, a prominent hard-line lawmaker who bitterly opposed Mr. Netanyahu's decision to sign the land-for-security peace accord brokered by President Bill Clinton in October.

In addition, two so-called princes of Likud — former Finance Minister Dan Meridor and former Science Minister Benjamin Begin, only son of the late Prime Minister Menachem Begin — resigned from the party last month to announce that they would run for prime minister. Mr. Meridor is a moderate and Mr. Begin is a hard-liner, but both had bitter feuds with Mr. Netanyahu.

Even before Mr. Arens' bombshell Monday, Likud was on pins and needles as it awaited the decision of Yitzhak Mordechai, the popular defense minister who is openly toying with the idea of joining another party. If Mr. Mordechai backs Mr. Arens or defects from Likud, taking with him the votes of working class and Sephardic Jews who are a crucial component of the party's constituency, it would be a near-crippling blow to Mr. Netanyahu's prospects, some observers say.

But Mr. Netanyahu remains more popular with the Likud rank-and-file, and possibly with the Israeli electorate, than he is with the party elite, and few analysts are ready to write off his chances all together.

Still, the challenge by Mr. Arens is a heavy blow to the Israeli leader. Not only did he launch Mr. Netanyahu's political career by recruiting him in Washington, but he has consistently pushed the younger man into the limelight.

Impressed by Mr. Netanyahu's fluency as a telegenic defender of Israeli policies to American audiences, Mr. Arens used his influence in 1984 to have him appointed as ambassador to the United Nations, bypassing far more experienced candidates.

Following Likud's electoral victory in 1988, Mr. Arens, by then foreign minister, intervened again to bring him into government as deputy foreign minister, in charge of relations with the U.S. Congress.

After Likud's defeat by the Labor Party in 1992, Mr. Arens resigned abruptly from public life rather than seek the party leadership. At 67, he said, he was too old to manage the party's renewal. That cleared the way for Mr. Netanyahu to seize control of Likud and, four years later, lead it to victory.

BORED OF EDUCATION — Under a banner reading "We Will Win," hundreds of striking students gathered in central Athens on Monday to protest legislation to reform Greece's educational system.

2 U.S. Jets Fire on Iraqi Missile Sites

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches

WASHINGTON — Iraq continued to challenge U.S. jets patrolling its no-flight zones Monday, drawing new missile fire from American aircraft.

Two U.S. F15s on routine missions over the northern no-flight zone fired on a ground-based missile launch site near Mosul.

An F16CJ fired a high-speed anti-radiation missile (HARM) at a second site at virtually the same time, Lieutenant Colonel Steve Campbell said.

The two incidents took place after the U.S. planes were illuminated by Iraqi radar.

There was no damage to U.S. aircraft, and damage to the Iraqi sites was being assessed, the Pentagon said.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, meanwhile, announced that she would travel to Riyadh and Cairo later this month for talks on Iraq and the Middle East peace process.

The two-day visit to the Saudi and Egyptian capitals will come after Mrs. Albright's talks in Moscow from Jan. 25 to 27, said James Rubin, the State Department spokesman.

In Saudi Arabia, foreign ministers of six Arab Gulf nations gave cautious support to a Saudi proposal that seeks to press the United Nations to lift its trade embargo on Iraq while maintaining the ban on military equipment or material that could be used for military purposes.

Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz of Iraq was quoted by the official Iraqi News Agency as saying that Iraq "categorically rejects the so-called Saudi initiative."

Iraq will accept only "a total lifting of sanctions," he said.

The Saudi proposal was discussed Sunday but no formal announcement on the outcome was made.

The incident Monday over Iraq comes three weeks after the U.S.-British air strikes against the country. Since the strikes, U.S. warplanes have been targeted repeatedly by Iraqi missile radar in the no-flight zones.

Iraq on Sunday described Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, which both allow their territory to be used as bases for U.S. and British aircraft patrolling the southern no-flight zone, as "thieves and outlaws."

Mr. Aziz also said Baghdad refused to apologize for its 1990 invasion of Kuwait and called for the scrapping of a UN resolution that demarcated the border in the emirate's favor. (APF, AP)

IRAQ: Pressure Grows on Security Council to Ease Sanctions end of the Gulf War in 1991.

Secretary-General Kofi Annan defended Mr. Butler on Monday. "I don't think the issue is Butler," he told reporters, after repeating that he had no evidence that Mr. Butler had cooperated with the United States in spying on Iraq. "I don't think the issue is UNSCOM. We are dealing with much larger issues about compliance of Iraq and stability in the region."

American diplomats are watching Canada and the Netherlands, two other new members, for signs of where they will stand. In Amsterdam on Monday, the Dutch representative on the 23-member Special Commission's governing board supported the view that sanctions could be rewritten while arms inspections remained in place.

The commissioner, Koos Ooms, a scientist, said that this course of action would rebuild unity in the Security Council and "would at least snatch away from Saddam Hussein the weapon of being able to say that the Iraqi people are suffering because of the sanctions."

The French government says that it is preparing new proposals along these lines for the Security Council in consultation with other Europeans.

Even the British, the strongest ally of the United States on Iraq policy, now favors a new inspection system, Prime Minister Tony Blair said Monday in an open letter to the French newspaper Libération.

"We are holding talks with France and other eminent members of the Security Council to find a formula allowing monitoring to resume in Iraq," he wrote, "but under a new system that would avoid the inspectors' presence creating a new crisis every three months."

But he added that Britain agreed with the United States that an expansion of the "oil for food" program would be the best way to aid Iraqis suffering from sanctions. Iraq is now permitted to sell up to $5.2 billion in oil every six months, although low international oil prices have prevented the Iraqis from reaching that target.

TURKEY: Ecevit Forms a Government

They cite his beliefs in anti-imperialism, protectionist economics and heavy state involvement in the economy.

A policy statement distributed by his party, however, says the party has reformed and now favors "a market economy that should operate within a democratic leftist framework in which workers' participation and joint people's enterprises will play a dominant role."

Virtually alone among senior politicians here, Mr. Ecevit lives modestly and has avoided the taint of scandal. His insistence on driving to work in an aging Turkish sedan rather than using the chauffeur-driven Mercedes to which he is entitled has given him a reputation as something of an eccentric.

Mr. Ecevit's education also sets him apart from many of his colleagues. He studied English literature at Ankara University, and later Sanskrit and Bengali at London University. In 1957 he spent eight months at Harvard.

Before entering politics, Mr. Ecevit worked as a journalist, including as a columnist for the Winston-Salem Journal in North Carolina. He is an accomplished translator and has produced Turkish versions of works ranging from "The Cocktail Party" by T.S. Eliot to the Indian classic "Bhagavadgita."

Bulent Ecevit gets another nod.

U.S. and China Reopen Talks on Human Rights

Reuters

WASHINGTON — China and the United States resumed dialogue on human rights Monday after a hiatus of more than four years and under the shadow of a Chinese crackdown on dissidents challenging the one-party system.

Delegations led by Harold Koh, the U.S. assistant secretary of state, and Wang Guangya, China's assistant foreign minister, met at the State Department for two days of talks on the subject, one of the most contentious in relations between the two countries.

The diplomats agreed to the resumption of human-rights talks when President Bill Clinton visited China in June — during one of the warmer spells in the relationship.

The mood has soured since Chinese courts gave stiff prison sentences to democracy activists in December. Some human-rights groups and members of Congress have said they think the dialogue will be pointless and possibly counterproductive.

But U.S. officials say they will press on, taking advantage of a chance to put their views in a formal context.

"The dialogue will provide an opportunity for us to discuss the recent disturbing developments in the Chinese government's treatment of the democracy movement," said a U.S. official.

Orlandus Wilson, 81, Foundation of the Golden Gate Quartet, Dies

New York Times Service

Orlandus Wilson, 81, whose bass voice was the foundation of the Golden Gate Quartet's gospel harmonies, died on Dec. 30 in Paris, where he lived.

The Golden Gate Quartet had a huge influence on American sacred and secular music. Performing in clubs and concert halls as well as churches, and backing up blues singers such as Lead Belly and Josh White, the quartet demonstrated that gospel had all the vitality of secular music. Its driving versions of spirituals were a model of vocal harmony for groups from the Dixie Hummingbirds to the Spaniels. Mr. Wilson, who joined the group in 1934, provided its syncretized bass lines for six decades.

Mr. Wilson was born in Chesapeake, Virginia. When he joined the Golden Gate Jubilee Singers in 1934, all four members were still in high school.

Two years later the group was singing five days a week for a radio station in Columbia, South Carolina, and in 1937, they signed to RCA Records' Bluebird label. In 1938, they were part of the program at John Hammond's historic "Spirituals to Swing" concert at Carnegie Hall, sharing the bill with Joe Turner, Sidney Bechet, Lionel Hampton and Benny Goodman.

The group moved to Columbia Records in 1941 and shortened its name to the Golden Gate Quartet.

In 1958, after a 28-country tour sponsored by the State Department, the Golden Gate Quartet relocated to Paris. With Mr. Wilson as its manager and arranger, the group continued to be a major concert draw.

Mr. Wilson announced his retirement from performing with the quartet in October but continued to oversee rehearsals for his replacement, Andrew Freeman.

He is survived by his wife, Gun, and a son, Charles, of California.

Marquess of Bristol, Prodigal Son
BURY ST. EDMUNDS, England (AP) — The Marquess of Bristol, 44, who squandered millions of his family's fortune on drugs and was jailed twice for drug possession, has died at his farmhouse in Suffolk, England, an agent for his estate said.

Simon Pott said Sunday that Lord Bristol, born Frederick William John Augustus Hervey, died in his sleep and was found Sunday morning at the house on the family estate near Bury St. Edmunds. He did not disclose a cause of death, but said Lord Bristol had been suffering from a flu-like illness for a short time.

The 7th Marquess of Bristol, who inherited the title in 1985 when his father died, led a colorful and troubled life, courting publicity almost every step of the way. He became a registered drug addict in 1984, meaning he had signed with his National Health Service doctor for treatment of his addiction. He later served a total of 19 months in prison for cocaine and heroin possession. At one of his trials, in 1993, it was estimated his addiction had cost his family about £7 million ($11.5 million) in 10 years.

In 1984, Lord Bristol married Francesca Fisher, the daughter of a property developer in Marbella, Spain, but the union ended in divorce.

Lord Bristol's half-brother, Lord Frederick Hervey, 19, will become the 8th Marquess of Bristol.

Clare Potter, 95, Fashion Designer
NEW YORK (NYT) — Clare Potter, 95, a leading American fashion designer of the 1930s and '40s known for imaginative use of color and simplicity of line, died Jan. 5 at her home in Fort Ann, New York. The cause of death was not disclosed.

Ms. Potter was one of the designers credited with inventing American sportswear, a style that has influenced designers all over the world. She was a featured designer at Lord & Taylor when the store was headed by the legendary Dorothy Shaver, and received the first Lord & Taylor Design Award in 1938 for "distinguished designing in the field of sports clothes for women."

"She was incredibly important," said Richard Martin, the curator of the Costume Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. "She was one of that first group in the 1930s trial is I think it gives us a record for history and I think the record would be more favorable for us than the record that exists now," Mr. Carville said.

CLINTON: History Is the Judge

But senior White House officials have resisted such an approach. Instead they have been pushing — sometimes against Mr. Clinton's own instincts — for a censure resolution that would denounce him for his actions in trying to cover up his affair with Monica Lewinsky during legal proceedings.

Unlike an outright acquittal, such a resolution could undermine Mr. Clinton's attempts to portray this process as nothing more than vindictiveness by his enemies, particularly if both parties come together to support censure as they did during the debate last week over trial rules.

Few would say so publicly, but White House strategists saw bad news in the 100 to 0 decision Friday by the Senate to put aside differences and set procedures for the trial because it served to legitimize a process they have been able to dismiss as Republican perfidy because of the consistent party-line votes in the House.

"If he is censured, history is going to look less kindly on him than if he's not censured, that's for sure," said George Edwards, director of the Center for Presidential Studies at Texas A&M University. "It gives a substantial amount of legitimacy to all of the flogging of Clinton that's taken place in many quarters."

The costs of a protracted trial, though, weighed more heavily for many White House officials who desperately want to end a political crisis that will have enveloped the administration for a full year as of next week. And some advisers concluded that censure might yet prove useful in shaping the historical depiction of this period.

"It will isolate this as an act of poor judgment, hold him accountable for it but still allow people to put it in perspective in the long run of history," said Lanny Davis, a former White House special counsel.

"I'm not sure the president would agree with that. But, among his friends and supporters, there is a feeling that censure is necessary for him to get closure and for his presidency to be judged fairly."

Moreover, as some advisers see it, the best way to shape history will be for Mr. Clinton to finish on a political high and the best way for him to do that will be to secure major accomplishments on the policy front before the 2000 political calendar makes it impossible.

In this view, restructuring Social Security or Medicare to avert financial insolvency will go a long way toward improving the Clinton legacy.

But would a quick resolution of the Lewinsky matter be so unsatisfying for diehard opponents that they would feel the need to take out their frustration by blocking his initiatives? Or would a long trial so poison relations that the Democratic president could no longer work effectively with the Republican Congress?

Aides clearly worry about the second calculation.

In the view of many critics, it will not make a difference how the Senate trial ends because impeachment by the House amounted to the ultimate censure; Mr. Clinton's place in history, they believe, is set.

"If history's accurate, it's not going to be good," said John Whitehead, president of the Rutherford Institute, which financed Paula Jones's lawsuit against Mr. Clinton.

"I don't think he's going to go down as the worst president ever. But he's going to be remembered as an embattled president who had problems with telling the truth and issues of morality."

"You can't get away from it. He's going to be marked forever. And it's his fault."

The events of 1998 and 1999 are being captured on videotape for future generations to judge for themselves. That offers some solace to Clinton advisers who believe he will have the same effect on future Americans as he has had on today's voters.

"One hundred years from now, people will look at the film of the president and the film of the other people, and people don't change," said a person close to the president.

"In the year 2099, it's going to be 72 percent believe that it was just trumped-up charges. 28 percent are going to believe the guy was a crook and should have been ousted with a stake in his heart," he continued. "It's frozen in time for eons."

First Images For 2000 Virtual Milan Menswear

By Suzy Menkes
International Herald Tribune

LONDON — Iggy Pop tore off his top and hurled it at the crowd, revealing a wrinkly, rippling chest, naked but for a sparkling chain. But the rest of Donatella Versace's menswear show showed the glam side of rock and roll, with its sleek and sexy tailoring and touches of romance in the rose embroideries.

At least, that's how it looked lolling in bed looking at the screen.

In bed? On screen? For the first time in a career that goes back as far as Iggy Pop's rocking years, a broken limb has forced me to be a long-distance spectator for the current Milan menswear season that opened last weekend and closes Wednesday.

Since these are the first shows for the year 2000, I set myself a task. Using modern technology from video tapes through digital imaging, e-mail and CD-ROM, could I become a virtual fashion editor — reporting on shows from my PC instead of the front row? Hey, with the high cost in time, energy and travel, this could be fashion's future!

A sequined dress and plaid shawl worn by a sheepish Chris Eubank, the British boxer, was my first glimpse, courtesy of Italian television's Rai Uno channel, of the opening show for fall-winter 1999/2000. You could imagine the public guffawing.

But by the time photographer Christopher Moore had put the show's images on-line, I could see that Vivienne Westwood was on her familiar heroic male track, sending swash-buckling models in tweed or plaid across the kitten-scattered floor. It would take a Braveheart to wear the clothes as shown, with hats, gloves, argyle socks, eyeliner and lipstick. But there were classy, classic coats, turtlenecks and well-cut jackets with pinstripes draped on the bias. As ever, I wished that Westwood could distill her vision of the peacock male into simpler, streamlined clothes.

Every piece of Jil Sander's collection looked like it could walk off screen and onto the street. But looking at the linear hats and suits in pale colors and at the de luxe sportswear, I was frustrated. Even freezing the frame or enlarging the image could not focus on the missing element: the fabrics.

My fingers itched to stroke the surfaces, rather than the mousepad. From the way the clothes moved on the video winged in from Milan, I could sense the weightless volume and cozy simplicity that comes from making jackets or sweaters in super-luxury materials. Even the pants seemed to have a velvet pile.

The sporty elements in the show — zippered boxy jackets in creamy wool or supple black leather — took Sander's look fast forward from last season. So did fresh colors like moss green, yellow and pimento among the pallid palette. Short coats, Gaultier's double-breasted suit and Mongolian fur hat.

Dolce & Gabbana's marled sweater and layered pants.

Versace's fur-trimmed graphic coat over suit.

Jil Sander's licorice-black hooded top.

Vivienne Westwood's tailored jacket and kilt.

BOOKS

THURGOOD MARSHALL American Revolutionary

By Juan Williams. 459 pages.

$27.50. Times Books.

Reviewed by Ronald K.L. Collins

JUSTICE is blind. The law is neutral. Detached reason alone governs. This is the paradigm of the rule of law. Every law student needs to learn it, every lawyer needs to respect it and every judge needs to enforce it. But must it always be that way? Start there and you can begin to learn about one of the greats in the life of the law: Thurgood Marshall (1908-1993).

Where justice was abstract, Marshall gave it a face. Where it was fixed, he made it flexible. Where it was dormant, he gave it new energy. Whatever else, this is not an orthodox, by-the-book justice. It is understandable that Juan Williams tags him as he does in his engaging biography, "Thurgood Marshall: American Revolutionary."

But "revolutionary" is the wrong word. A revolutionary Thurgood Marshall was not — not really. For one thing, he was too much of the law to rebel against it. Besides, he was once U.S. solicitor general (1965-67), hardly a post befitting a revolutionary. Moreover, he had a remarkably moderating influence on radicals and reactionaries. Ultimately, Marshall believed in the rule of law, though not quite as commonly understood. Williams's subtle aside, his well-documented account demonstrates that Marshall was no radical but, rather, an uncommonly skilled lawyer who knew how to make the system work, or at least work better.

"Mr. Civil Rights," as he was known, was a realist. He helped to re-define the law so that justice could, from time to time, peek out from behind her blindfold. Compassion — that instinctual drive to combat injustice and comfort its victims — informed his sense of legal realism. With that drive he won 29 of the 32 cases he argued before the Supreme Court before becoming solicitor general. With it, too, he won the case that would force desegregation with him; Brown v. Board of Education.

Marshall's career is defined by what happened on May 17, 1954, that Monday when Chief Justice Earl Warren spoke for a unanimous court in the historic school desegregation case. That momentous event frames Marshall's early career: his success in the equal pay cases, circa 1937; his middle years, especially his 1948 victory in the landmark case striking down a restrictive covenant, Shelley v. Kraemer; and his Court years, including his stand against capital punishment in Furman v. Georgia (1972). Unlike Louis Brandeis (another great progressive lawyer), Marshall never equaled as a jurist what he had achieved as a lawyer. This is not to disparage his judicial legacy but to place it in perspective, to recognize the importance of his pre-Supreme Court achievements. The book's greatest contribution is its framing of the legacy of that extraordinary legal mind that in 1946 convinced an all-white Southern jury to acquit 23 of 25 blacks charged with rioting.

The true measure of Marshall's greatness, then, is the historic course he charted as a lawyer. That course is well outlined by Williams, who shows the several sides of this constitutional litigator — the big and busy lawyer from Baltimore who reshaped the law almost as if he were one of the Founding Fathers. There is a lesson here: in law that demands to be emphasized. To appreciate the long shadow Marshall cast on the law, one must not be content to begin and end with his judicial opinions. Rather, one must study how as a lawyer he developed new approaches to old problems, how he looked outside the law to the social sciences, how he legitimized what was once illegal (e.g., in the sit-in cases of 1961) and how he did all of this and more in a deliberate step-by-step fashion.

About 15 books have been devoted to Marshall. Plus two picture books, two audio cassette sets, two videos and 11 children's books. Add a dozen or more Web sites, including a very educational one keyed to the Williams book (www.thurgoodmarshall.com). Not even the revered Chief Justice John Marshall or Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes can claim such a following.

In the thick of all of this remarkable attention, the Washington Post correspondent Williams's book stands out. It is a natural sequel to his much-acclaimed 1987 book, "Eyes on the Prize: America's Civil Rights Years, 1954-1965."

But its special strength is not as a scholarly and probing legal account of Marshall's constitutional career. Nor is it an unfailingly impartial history of the man. Williams is too close to his subject, to the point of sometimes being too apologetic for some of Marshall's failings.

Nonetheless, "Thurgood Marshall" is remarkable in its vivid and detailed account of its subject. To his credit and our benefit, Williams mined many biographical veins. Throughout, he manifests his impressive journalistic skills: He draws on numerous interviews, archival materials (including FBI files and Marshall's papers), and newspaper and magazine accounts (including edifying stories from the Baltimore Afro-American and unifying ones from the Lynchburg News).

Ronald K.L. Collins, co-editor of the on-line periodical Books-on-Law, wrote this for The Washington Post.

CHESS

By Robert Byrne

GARRY KASPAROV's colleagues are sniping at his claim to be the world's best player.

In 1998, he did not win a single tournament, whereas Viswanathan Anand, the Indian star, triumphed at Wijk-aan-Zee, Netherlands, in February; Linare, Spain, in March; Madrid in May, and the Fontys Tournament in Tilburg, Netherlands, in November. Tournament play does not decide who is the world champion. That is determined by a formal match. But Kasparov has not contested a title match since 1995, when he defeated Anand. Anand got off to a good start at Tilburg by defeating Joel Lautier of France in the first round.

Even though 4...Qc7 is not a new move, it introduces an alternative variation of the Sicilian Defense without a name, but it is a theoretical cousin of the Taimanov Variation, which delays pawn play to maintain flexibility of development.

After 5.Nb5 Qb8 6.c4, White has been permitted to set up the Maroczy bind, but the question is always whether he will be able to sustain it significantly. Anand shows how.

Anand's seizure of queenside terrain with 12.b4 was not vulnerable to counterattack by 12...a5? because 13.b5 Ne5 14.Na4 Ne4 15.Nb6 Ra7 16.Nc8 Rb7 Ba7 Qa7 wins rook for knight, with not quite adequate counterplay for Black.

With 13.Ra2, Anand took out insurance against any chance of ...d5, because he had made a timely Rd2 possible. Then, with 15.Bf3, he brought up additional power to enhance his grip on the important d5 square.

Lautier might have challenged Anand's 16.Rc2 by 16...Qc4, because 17.Nd5 Nd5! 18.Rc4 Ne3 19.Qc1 Nc4 20.Qd4 Nc6 yields Black approximately even material in a solid position. In any case, after 16...Nb7, Anand was free to strengthen his position systematically.

Finally Anand began to convert his superiority in space into an attack with 20.g4, 21.g5 and 22.Bg4. He quickly wonched up the pressure with 24.Qh3 and 27.Rd3, achieving an imposing layout, but he had yet to reveal a mating plan.

Lautier thought that he could knock out a vital center pawn with 27...b5?, but after 28.cb ab 29.Nd4!, he saw that he was wrong. Defense by 29...Qb8 would have been smashed by 30.Ne6! fe 31.Bc6 Ne6 32.Qe6 Kf8 33.E5! Ne5 34.fg Kg7 35.Rf7 Kg8 36.Rh7 Kf8 37.g7mate. So, he yielded a pawn with 29...Nf8 30.Nb5.

After 31.Nc3, Lautier's 31...f6! made matters worse. Anand won a second pawn with 32.E5! ef 33.ef g4 34.Bf5 Nf5 35.Qf5, because 35...fg? 36.Qf7 Kh8 37.Bd4 is killing. On 39.Nb5, Lautier gave up, because 39...Rd7 40.Nd6 Rd6 ends in 41.f7mate.

Position after 38...Bd5

The trends for 1999-2000 are utility/biker looks mixed with romance, and a lot of fur.

crisp shirts and utility jackets were ultra modern, but it wasn't easy to see the all-important details. This was a collection that begged to be held in the hand, rather than seen on film.

Yet the image is essential to a modern brand, now that the era of "release dates" for photographs belongs to the distant past. A modern designer has to be skillful not just at cutting, but in projecting an image through the prism of a show.

The late Gianni Versace understood the power of the public image and the potency of models and music. The fall menswear show — where Iggy Pop's rock concert divided the classic Versace from the funkier Versus line — seemed a familiar formula. But it was powerfully done, creating an ambience of subversive sexiness, with a vast, dark space and spots casting pools of light on the shiny runway.

The clothes were predominantly black, but the lighting picked up the sheen of leather coats, the fluffy fur collars and the sparkling embroidered effects, from racing stripes on pants through geometric markings on the jackets. Donatella Versace knows that men don't want dress-down sportswear from this label, so she played with hard, sharply cut coats over tight pants with the occasional baggy trousers or techno texture.

Versus was cool, but seemed a bit tricky, with shrunken flea-market-style shirt sleeves cut on the curve and flashes of white as well as Hare Krishna orange. Rai Uno focused entirely on Naomi Campbell, who tossed her mane and strutted some brief stuff.

At Dolce & Gabbana, I could imagine myself looking up the red-carpeted stairway at the fashion house, as the models skirted a terra-cotta urn. That seemed like a metaphor for the rich earthy colors and natural textures that contrasted with the tough biker look.

The mix was utility and romance, as pants had huge back pockets and body belts, while sweaters were body-conscious and textured. Wide woolly cummerbunds like trusses might have inspired the shapely suits. All the layering made me focus on sweaters that looked exceptional in airy, hairy marled textures.

Knitwear is well showcased on the small screen. I wanted to finger the fluffy mohair brush strokes on a sweater at Cerruti — part of casual theme that went through the signature tailoring. Any fashion-aware male could have understood these upscale clothes on the sporty side: shirt-soft jackets, zippered fleeces, coats layered over parkas. And while many shows featured bare arms in sleeveless sweaters, here was a collection that seemed tailor-made for midwinter 2000.

Issey Miyake's show was also strong on outerwear with long geometric-cut coats and short car coat lengths. The designer Naoki Takizawa has a millennium spin with fabrics, giving a space age feel to athletic pants sliced with zippers or jackets in what looked like crumpled laminated paper. Even beside the runway, I would have had a hard time with the inventive materials.

Jean Paul Gaultier's show looked sparky. The French designer's take was a Hollywood Little Italy look — Tony Bennett with a touch of Elvis in the lounge cream suits and rocker-meets-biker sequined jackets.

Even on screen, Gaultier's creativity shows up, once you decode the style: classic tailoring (even if the models had carrot-red hair) mingling with exceptional pieces, like a speckled jacket knitted to look like tweed worn with an Aran sweater. Several themes followed the threads of recent haute couture and women's ready-to-wear collections, especially the Aran knits and the plaid sequins, which were used for hip sweaters and even for Gaultier's signature kilt.

The trends I picked up on are utility/biker looks mixed with romance in embroideries and plush fabrics, including a lot of fur.

The show I am most sorry to miss? It is the debut collection of Antonio d'Amico, Versace's long-time partner, who is now launching his own line. First collections have a special excitement: the intensity of the designer, the expectations of the audience, the tingle of anticipation at the opening outfit, the first ripple of applause. Modern technology is no substitute for the smell of the hair gel and the buzz of the crowd.

Greenspan Sees a Mild Slowdown

HONG KONG — Alan Greenspan, chairman of the U.S. Federal Reserve Board, told Asian central bank chiefs on Monday that any slowing of the U.S. economy would be "relatively moderate," according to Andrew Crockett, head of the Bank for International Settlements.

Mr. Crockett quoted Mr. Greenspan, who did not speak to the press, as saying that a slowdown was expected but would "still leave a satisfactory economic position."

That was a measure of good news for the 17 central bank chiefs — 11 from Asia — attending the meeting of the BIS in Hong Kong. Asia is counting on continued U.S. economic strength to help pull the region out of its worst recession in more than 50 years.

Mr. Crockett, general manager of the BIS, said after the one-day meeting that the group was predicting an economic recovery in Asia this year. He said Masaru Hayami, the governor of the Bank of Japan, told the gathering that Japan's economy would return to "modest" growth next year.

"The sense was in Asia the situation is relatively difficult but the worst part of the cycle is over," Mr. Crockett said, "and there will be some recovery from now on." But he said no concrete measures had emerged from the five-and-a-half hours of talks, which were intended to provide a forum for informal discussion.

He said that the central bankers had agreed that the world economic environment was "a reasonably positive one" and that Asia was "on the mend" but that efforts to shore up shaky banking systems needed to continue.

The role of hedge funds, blamed by many Asian leaders for destabilizing their economies through market speculation, was also discussed, Mr. Crockett said. The central bankers discussed greater transparency and a "level playing field" to monitor the movements of hedge funds, he said without elaborating.

BAT to Buy Rothmans for $7.6 Billion

LONDON — British American Tobacco PLC, the second-largest cigarette maker in the world, said Monday that it was buying the fourth-largest cigarette maker, Rothmans International BV, for $7.6 billion ($7.6 billion) in stock.

The new company, which plans to retain the name British American Tobacco PLC, would have a 16 percent share of the world market, trailing only Philip Morris Inc.

Brands of the merged company would include Kent, Lucky Strike, Dunhill, Benson and Hedges, Peter Stuyvesant, Rothmans and Parisienne. BAT is British-based, and Rothmans International is based in the Netherlands. Together, they produced more than 900 billion cigarettes in 1997, the companies said.

"This merger represents a major step forward in the achievement of our vision to become the world's leading international tobacco company," the BAT chairman, Martin Broughton, who would chair the merged company, said.

There had been speculation BAT was talking about a deal with R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., No. 3 in the international market. "This is the best alternative available to us," Mr. Broughton said. "It gives us clear leadership in the emerging markets. The Reynolds deal wouldn't give us that."

A BAT spokesman said there would be some job losses but that it was too early to say how many there would be.

Rothmans' majority owners, the Swiss-based Compagnie Financière Richemont AG and Rembrandt Group Ltd. of South Africa, would own 35 percent of the new company. Richemont owns two-thirds of Rothmans, while Rembrandt holds one-third. Both Richemont and Rembrandt are controlled by the family of Anton Rupert, 82, who founded Rembrandt in 1945. His son, Johann Rupert, 48, is chief executive of Richemont and chairman of Rembrandt.

BAT and Rothmans said the transaction, subject to approval by authorities and shareholders, should be completed by June. The combined company would have leading positions in 55 markets and is likely to come under the scrutiny of Western European and Asia-Pacific regulatory authorities.

The deal uniting companies valued at an estimated $21.5 billion.

In a joint statement, the companies and shareholders said the deal "increases proportion of sales volume derived from international brands, which will improve overall margins."

The takeover strengthens BAT "in mature, stable markets like Europe and also strengthens them in the key growth markets of Asia-Pacific, Africa and the Middle East," said Nick Bunker, an analyst at HSBC Investment Bank PLC. "This is a much better deal than anything BAT could have done with RJR and puts a question mark over RJR's future."

RJR has said it is seeking a partner for its international business, and analysts had long concluded BAT would make the best match. BAT's purchase of Rothmans virtually eliminates it as a potential buyer, however, analysts said.

Mr. Broughton said a bid for RJR Tobacco was off his agenda. RJR's U.S. market share has stalled, its U.S. cigarette sales are expected to fall amid an industry-wide price increase and its Nabisco Holdings Corp. cookie and cracker affiliate is in the midst of a turnaround effort.

BAT plans to pay for Rothmans with 604.3 million new common shares and 241.7 million preferred shares. At the same time, BAT is to pay current shareholders a final dividend of 16 pence a share and a special interim dividend of 4 pence July 1. Shares in BAT surged 96 pence, to 638. Rothmans stock is not listed. (AP, Bloomberg)

Dollar Falls Against Yen Amid Hopes for Japan

NEW YORK — The dollar's plunge against the yen accelerated Monday, dropping the U.S. currency to levels last seen more than two years ago, as traders speculated that the Japanese economy may have bottomed out.

The dollar was also hurt by talk in the market that the United States is not concerned about the decline of the dollar; it has lost about a quarter of its value against the yen since mid-August.

"Over the last couple of months, there's been a growing sense that the various policy measures from Japan have been sufficient to stabilize the economy," said Lisa Finstrom, a currency analyst at Salomon Smith Barney. "That has taken away the selling pressure exerted on the yen for about a year."

A series of proposed spending plans and tax cuts to lift Japan from its year-long recession culminated in November with the approval of a supplementary $24 trillion yen ($215 billion) budget. Japan's government is also spending 60 trillion yen to bail out its ailing banking system.

The yen also got a boost from speculation Japanese investors and companies, eager to show gains on their balance sheets before the fiscal year ends March 31, will sell higher-yielding assets overseas and convert the dollar proceeds to yen. Furthermore, a surge in Japanese government bond yields in recent months is attracting Japanese investment away from the United States.

"There's some repatriation by Japanese investors who are mindful of the potential for further yen appreciation," said Alan Wilde, a manager at Scottish Mutual Portfolio Management in Glasgow.

Max Darnell, a partner at First Quadrant LP, which oversees $28 billion in assets in Pasadena, California, said the higher yields in Japanese bonds prompted him to increase his holdings of the securities "a couple of percentage points" in most portfolios.

"The recent bump up in yields at the long end of the curve has lifted the yen," he said.

The U.S. Treasury, meanwhile, denied speculation in the market that it was not concerned about the dollar's fall against the yen. "The story is not an accurate reflection of Treasury views," said Howard Schloss, the Treasury's chief spokesman.

Dollar Instability

In 4 p.m. trading, the dollar fell to 108.675 yen from 111.03 yen Friday.

The dollar strengthened against the European single currency, with the euro falling to $1.1497 from $1.1659 on Friday, as reports showed a slowing economy in Germany, the largest of the 11 nations that adopted the euro.

In Germany, orders to the manufacturing industry fell in November. That, combined with a report Friday showing that German unemployment unexpectedly rose in December, may give the European Central Bank reason to cut European interest rates to boost growth. That would make returns on dollar-denominated investments more attractive.

In other trading, the pound fell to $1.6295 from $1.6422. The dollar rose to 1.4000 Swiss francs from 1.3940 francs.

Thinking Ahead / Commentary

Clinton's Fate No Big Deal to Markets

By Reginald Dale
International Herald Tribune

WASHINGTON — How much will the fate of President Bill Clinton affect financial markets and the future of the U.S. economy? Whatever Mr. Clinton and his supporters might want you to think, the realistic answer has to be "probably not very much."

The official opening of his trial in the U.S. Senate last week did not stop Wall Street from hitting new highs. Currency markets have tended to be more susceptible than stock markets to developments in the impeachment saga, but that may be partly because foreigners are sometimes more alarmed than Americans by leadership crises in Washington.

Ask U.S. business executives about political gridlock in the capital and many will tell you they could not be happier. Anything that paralyzes government and leaves business free from interference can only be welcomed, they say.

Unlike citizens of many other countries, Americans are used to the idea of a relatively weak central government, hemmed in by checks and balances as the Founding Fathers intended. That does not prevent many Americans from, erroneously, associating the president with the nation's economic well-being.

Mr. Clinton's supporters would certainly argue that his continued presence is necessary to keep the economy growing strongly, as it has, by a fortunate coincidence, since he first took office. But investors are increasingly begging to differ.

According to David Hale of the Zurich Group of financial companies in Chicago, investors are now so confident that economic globalization and technological innovation are mainly responsible for America's current prosperity that many believe that "politicians have become irrelevant to the process."

As in the period immediately before World War I — the previous high point of globalization — there is a widespread belief that business and corporate leaders, not politicians, are the dominant personalities reshaping the global economic order, Mr. Hale says. In any case, Mr. Clinton will either survive or be replaced for the rest of his term by Vice President Al Gore, whose economic philosophy is not very different.

And insofar as Washington has contributed to economic growth, the credit is due primarily to Alan Greenspan, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, and to Robert Rubin, the Treasury secretary.

In some fields where the president can make a difference, such as trade policy, Mr. Clinton has not been doing much anyway. As one top Washington trade lawyer puts it, "Mr. Clinton's leadership on trade can hardly be missed, as he hasn't been showing any for the last four years."

Of course, much of Wall Street's insouciance about impeachment is due to the belief that Mr. Clinton won't be removed from office. If he were, says Thomas Gallagher of Lehman Brothers in Washington, there would probably be "a sharp but short negative reaction" in the markets.

Once it was clear that Mr. Clinton's economic team would remain in place, and continuity was established under Mr. Gore, confidence would quickly return. There could be new hope of a fresh start after a period in which Mr. Clinton's problems and partisan wrangling in Congress have weakened U.S. world leadership.

Certainly if Mr. Clinton stays in office, the prospects will not look great for cooperation between the White House and the Republican-led House of Representatives, which impeached him, to tackle important issues such as Social Security reform.

Politicians are not completely irrelevant. The government in Washington still controls the key levers of budgetary, tax, trade and regulatory policy. The president can order U.S. forces into battle at any moment, as Mr. Clinton recently did against Iraq.

But Wall Street and the U.S. economy are more likely to be thrown off course by a financial crisis in Brazil or a sudden plunge in corporate profits than by the Senate's verdict on Mr. Clinton, whichever way it goes.

Very briefly:

- Societe du Louvre SA will not have to undergo a court audit, because a judge rejected the U.S. investor Asher Edelman's latest move in his challenge of the Taittinger family's control of the French hotel company. Mr. Edelman, who owns about 12.5 percent of Societe du Louvre and has tried three times to buy the company, had asked the court to look into the pay and benefits given to the Taittinger family.
- Schneider SA, a French maker of electrical equipment, agreed to buy Lenz, a joint venture of NKT Holding AS of Denmark and Ahlstrom Oy of Finland, for 900 million euros ($1.05 billion) to expand its distribution of electrical plugs and switches.
- The Czech jobless rate rose to 7.5 percent in December, a post-Communist record, from 7 percent in November.
- Bayer AG, the German chemical company, said its Agfa-Gevaert film unit would buy Sterling Diagnostic Imaging Inc. of the United States to expand its X-ray business. Sterling is a privately held maker of X-ray film and equipment with sales of about $500 million. Terms were not disclosed.
- Continental AG, the German tiremaker, plans to invest 100 million Deutsche marks ($59.1 million) to build a tire factory in Romania as it seeks to raise its output in Eastern Europe.
- The London Metal Exchange began an investigation into its aluminum futures market to determine whether prices are being manipulated.

German and British Data Signal Slowdown

Bonn — Key gauges of manufacturing activity fell in November in Germany and Britain, according to reports released Monday, in further signs that an economic slowdown is taking root across Europe.

Germany said factory orders unexpectedly fell 1.5 percent in November, their second consecutive monthly drop, as both domestic and overseas demand slumped. Analysts had expected orders to rise slightly.

The drop heightened concern that Europe's largest economy was slowing faster than expected. That could raise pressure on the European Central Bank, which manages monetary policy for the 11 countries with a single currency, to cut interest rates to sustain growth. The government expects German economic growth to slow to 2.0 percent this year from 2.8 percent in 1998, although some private economists predict growth of just 1.4 percent.

"Manufacturing is in recession, and these figures will support the idea that there are further interest-rate cuts to come," said Mark Miller, an economist at Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Co.

The slowdown is not limited to the 11-nation euro zone; Britain said factory output fell in November for a fourth month in a row, with the strong pound and recessions in foreign markets combining to reduce demand for British goods. The figures were seen by analysts as giving the Bank of England more reason to cut interest rates to avert a recession.

Pressure on exports also was seen in Germany, as foreign orders to German factories fell 2.4 percent in November from October, the second monthly decline. Domestic orders fell 0.9 percent in November, the third consecutive monthly drop.

The decline in German orders was led by a 3.3 percent drop in orders for investment goods such as machine tools, with domestic capital-goods orders, a key indicator of future investment, falling 1.4 percent. Orders for durable goods such as washing machines and consumer products rose 1.1 percent.

"All the figures confirm that the economy is weakening and risks to current growth forecasts are on the downside," said Klaus Papenbrock, an economist at Deutsche Bank Research. He said he expected the European Central Bank to cut interest rates "as early as February."

The 0.2 percent decline in British factory output in November was somewhat smaller than expected. Nonetheless, the British economy, Europe's third-largest after Germany and France, is expected to grow less than 1 percent this year, hurt in particular by the strength of the pound.

"The well-known problem of the strength of sterling is still very much present," said a spokeswoman for Albright & Wilson, a British chemical company that last week warned of a "difficult trading environment."

2 French Banks Plan to Link Up

PARIS — Groupe Banques Populaires, a mutual bank, said Monday it was merging its corporate business with Natexis SA to enable the banks to cut costs and coordinate activities and form France's fourth-biggest publicly traded bank.

Natexis, a publicly traded bank of which Banques Populaires owns 73.5 percent, will sell new shares as part of the merger. The new bank, to be called Natexis Banques Populaires, will have assets of $7 billion euros ($101.4 billion).

Russia to Unfreeze Trading in Domestic Debt

MOSCOW — Russia will resume trading its frozen domestic debt Friday, the central bank said Monday, more than five months after a dramatic default that sent the country's economy into tailspin.

The central bank said it would start trading new ruble bonds that were being swapped for the defaulted debt. In addition, it will resume trading in so-called OFZ bonds maturing after Dec. 31, 1999, on which the government did not default.

Russia defaulted on most of its Treasury bills, known as GKOs, and suspended trading in OFZs on Aug. 17 as investors fled the debt market out of concern that the government could not raise enough money to meet its obligations.

The defaulted debt was worth around $40 billion at the time of the freeze, but with the resulting plunge in the value of the ruble, it is valued at about $12 billion. The ruble was steady Monday, with the dollar staying at 23.39 rubles.

Under restructuring terms offered by the government last year, holders of the frozen debt will receive 10 percent of their investment in cash, 20 percent in investment bonds and 70 percent in new long-term, interest-bearing paper.

The new bonds will probably drop in value as soon as they start trading as investors try to recoup some of their losses, investors said. Foreign banks, which hold about one-third of the 281 billion rubles ($12.01 billion) in defaulted debt, probably will try to sell the bonds quickly, though they may have trouble finding buyers.

Foreign investors are required to keep their ruble proceeds in special accounts that limit their ability to take the money out of the country.

Russian exporters also face tight currency restrictions, and the central bank tightened those controls Monday, saying it would require exporters to repatriate 75 percent of their hard-currency revenues, up from the previous limit of 50 percent.

Enterprise and Lasmo Ponder a British Oil Combination

LONDON — Two British oil and gas companies, Enterprise Oil PLC and Lasmo PLC, said Monday that they were holding talks on a possible combination aimed at facing the challenge of a deep slump in the oil market.

If Enterprise, the larger of the two companies, agreed to buy Lasmo, the transaction could be worth $910 million ($1.49 billion) or more.

The companies said they were exploring several options, including a full merger. Enterprise and Lasmo focus solely on oil production and not on refining or on selling fuel, so they have no other businesses to shelter them from low oil prices.

Enterprise, which failed when it made a hostile bid for Lasmo in 1994, warned that the latest talks could fall apart, too.

This followed a statement by Lasmo on Sunday that it was considering a merger with Enterprise or other companies as a way of improving its competitiveness.

Analysts said the announcements could lead to offers for the companies from larger oil firms.

"This may well smoke out another offer," said Tony Alves, an analyst with Henderson Crosthwaite Ltd. in London. "There are companies that are interested in either or both of these companies."

Lasmo shares rose 11 pence to close at 106, while Enterprise fell 5 to 277.

China Clays Turns Down Imetal's Bid

PARIS — Imetal SA, a French building-materials company, offered $280 million ($1.11 billion) on Monday for English China Clays PLC, a British maker of mineral products.

But English China Clays rejected the offer, saying it "fails by a wide margin to reflect the value of the company's business and prospects."

Imetal said it was offering 225 pence a share for the British company, a premium of 41 percent over the closing share price Friday. English China Clays shares soared $2.5 pence to close at 242.5 Monday.

Imetal, which makes roofing tiles, slate and concrete components, has nearly doubled in size over the past five years through a series of acquisitions.

English China Clays is a leading maker of kaolin, a fine clay used in ceramics. Its stock price has fallen sharply over the past year, a move that analysts have attributed to the recession in Asia and the strength of the pound, which has hurt export sales.

Stuart McCarthy, an analyst at HSBC Holdings in London, said there would be "definite synergies" for Imetal in buying English China Clays.

"People have been talking about a takeover of ECC for a long time because of its low share price," he said.

Imetal said it approached the company Wednesday to seek an agreement on its proposed offer, but it said English China Clays, based in Reading, England, had responded that it would need "a significant time" to consider the approach.

GITIC Move Irks Foreign Banks

By Mark Landler
New York Times Service

HONG KONG — Foreign banks are angry about China's announcement that Guangdong International Trust & Investment Corp. will file for bankruptcy and that creditors will have to go through the Chinese legal system to claim what they are owed.

More than 100 foreign creditors of Guangdong International, known as GITIC, were told Sunday that the company would file for bankruptcy. The move will put the foreign banks at the end of a long line of creditors seeking repayment of GITIC's debts, which total $4.3 billion.

"There's a lot of anger," said one executive at a financial company with loans outstanding to GITIC. "The general tone of the meeting is that they were disorganized and unresponsive to the needs of the creditors."

The executive, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said creditors were particularly shocked that Beijing was unwilling to repay loans that had been guaranteed by the State Administration of Foreign Exchange. Historically, the government has guaranteed such loans with state funds. But some analysts said the government might have decided to treat GITIC's creditors this way to drive home a larger message: It will not bail out foreigners who lend indiscriminately to provincial companies.

"This is not a decision taken lightly," said T.J. Tsai, who follows China for his own consulting firm in Hong Kong. "It is obviously a setback for the banks. But the government probably took the view that the banks needed to know there was risk to supporting these companies."

Still, some analysts said they doubted that foreign creditors would cease lending to Chinese companies. Chinese officials have gone to pains to say that GITIC's bankruptcy is an individual case, rather than a harbinger of financial distress throughout state-owned companies.

Although analysts warn that other investment-trust companies may follow GITIC into insolvency, China still seems stronger than many other Asian economies. While Japan and other Asian countries are mired in recession, Beijing is predicting its economy will grow 7 percent in 1999. In a display of its economic muscle, China raised $1 billion in a global bond offering last month.

"Bankers will go where the money is," Mr. Tsai said. "Creditors may want extra guarantees, but how can you ignore the opportunities of the China market?"

But GITIC could serve as a case study of the dangers of throwing money at Chinese ventures. The company was established in 1980 as the main fund-raising arm of the Guangdong provincial government.

Riding the boom in China's most economically fertile region, GITIC expanded into just about anything, from securities to silk.

But by autumn, it was sinking under billions of dollars of debts to creditors, and Beijing shut it down Oct. 6.

China's Trade Surplus Tops $43 Billion

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches

BEIJING — The trade surplus grew 7.9 percent to a record $43.59 billion last year, the Chinese government said Monday, as rising shipments to Europe and North America offset the effects of the recession in Asia.

Exports inched up 0.5 percent to $183.76 billion, while imports fell 1.5 percent to $140.17 billion, the official Xinhua press agency reported, quoting customs data.

In 1997, imports rose 2.5 percent and exports surged 20.9 percent.

Trade volume fell 0.4 percent last year, the first drop in total imports and exports since 1983, the report said.

Asia's economic troubles caused China's trade with the region to shrink last year after two decades of rapid growth. In the first nine months of 1998, exports to the rest of Asia fell 6.3 percent from the like period in 1997.

Beijing compensated by prodding companies to export more to North America, Europe and other markets, causing trade imbalances with those regions to expand.

The record Chinese trade surplus was bolstered by a surplus of about $2.3 billion in December alone, Xinhua said.

Exports in December rose 4.3 percent from a year earlier, to $20 billion, their first year-on-year increase in five months. Imports fell 7.4 percent, to $17.7 billion, Xinhua said.

Amid the Asian economic crisis, the government has adopted a variety of measures to stimulate exports.

"Our exports witnessed an extremely severe situation in 1998," Xinhua said. "It's a hard-won achievement to realize growth in exports, although the growth rate has slowed sharply from previous years."

At the same time, it said, a government anti-smuggling drive begun last year had "effectively curbed smuggling activities." (Bloomberg, Reuters)

Improved Accounting Urged

China must keep shareholders better informed and standardize its brokerage industry if it hopes to attract investors, according to the country's top securities regulator, the Associated Press reported from Shanghai.

Zhou Zhengrong, chairman of the China Securities Regulatory Commission, made the comments in a speech marking 20 years of economic reforms, a state newspaper reported.

Mr. Zhou called on companies to improve financial reporting to shareholders, and he urged executives to study a securities law issued last month by the legislature that banned insider trading.

LG's Demand for Job Security Sets Back Talks With Hyundai

Agence France-Press

SEOUL — Talks between the South Korean conglomerates Hyundai and LG on the details of their semiconductor merger hit another snag Monday after LG Semicon Ltd. demanded full job security.

LG said it would not resume talks on the semiconductor merger without a pledge from Hyundai to absorb all 9,600 employees at LG Semicon and retain them for as long as seven years.

"We will discuss details such as prices only after Hyundai agrees to hire all LG Semicon employees," said Kang Yoo Shik, head of LG Group's restructuring team.

He also called for payment in cash from Hyundai in return for taking over LG Semicon. The demands came five days after LG agreed to hand over control of its chip operations to Hyundai Electronics Industries Co. Hyundai officials refused to comment, saying only that talks should be completed this month as agreed.

Analysts have predicted difficulties for the talks between the groups, citing sharp differences over the valuation of LG Semicon's assets. LG Group's stock in its memory-chip business is believed by some to be worth around 1.3 trillion won ($1.11 billion). But LG has demanded more, and Hyundai officials say LG Semicon is over-estimating the value of its assets.

The LG-Hyundai accord followed four months of talks about which of the companies would control the new entity. Completion of the deal would mark the first real progress in Seoul's drive to consolidate its semiconductor industry.

Thailand to Support Commodity Prices

Bloomberg News

BANGKOK — The government will intervene in trading of as many as five agricultural commodities if needed to support prices and ensure that producers can at least break even, Finance Minister Taksin Nimmaheminda said Monday.

The government will buy or subsidize production of rice, shrimp, rubber, pineapples and potatoes, Mr. Taksin said. Thailand is the world's largest exporter of rice, natural rubber and canned pineapples.

On Monday, the government began buying and stockpiling rubber from local farmers whose earnings have plummeted as world rubber prices dropped more than 40 percent in four months, in part because of weaker demand from Asia.

Very briefly:

- Thailand's Securities and Exchange Commission imposed a fine of 211 million baht ($5.8 million) on a director and a shareholder of Thai Telephone & Telecommunication PCL for using inside information to sell shares in 1996.
- South Korea's central bank more than tripled its forecast for growth in gross domestic product this year, to 3.2 percent from a forecast of 1.0 percent in December. Bank of Korea cited higher industrial production and consumer spending as reasons for the revision.
- Cemex SA of Mexico, the world's third-largest cement maker, agreed to pay JG Summit Holdings Inc. $400 million for a 99 percent stake in Apo Cement Corp., owner of the Philippines' biggest cement factory.
- Australia's two best-known gold barons, Robert Champion de Crespigny and Joseph Gurnick, offered to buy the 60 percent of Great Central Mines Ltd. they did not already own for 276 million Australian dollars ($175.5 million).
- Malaysia's industrial output fell 4.7 percent in November from a month earlier, the third drop in four months and the largest one in nine months, as manufacturing slowed, the Department of Statistics said.
- Long-Term Credit Bank of Japan Ltd. chose Goldman Sachs & Co. as financial adviser for the sale of the bank's businesses. LTCB was declared insolvent and nationalized in October.

Very briefly:

- Continental Airlines Inc. and Northwest Airlines Corp. are discussing a four-way alliance with Alitalia SpA and KLM Royal Dutch Airlines NV, the chief executives of the European carriers said.
- Bergens Brunsvig Corp., the third-largest U.S. drug wholesaler, will buy Pharmacia Inc. for $1.4 billion in stock and assumed debt to expand its offerings to elderly patients.
- The Securities and Exchange Commission fined 28 Wall Street brokerages more than $26 million for alleged price-rigging on the Nasdaq Stock Market in an industrywide settlement closing a five-year case. The SEC also suspended 51 individual traders from the securities business.
- Brazil's government withheld 11.7 million reais ($9.7 million) in tax payments to Minas Gerais state in retaliation for the state's refusal to pay $15 billion in debt. The dispute has sent Brazilian stocks and bonds plummeting.
- Nabors Industries Inc., the largest driller of land-based oil and natural-gas wells, will buy Pool Energy Services Co., an oil-field services company, for $518 million in stock and assumed debt.

Blue Chips Retreat, but Nasdaq Soars Again

NEW YORK — Blue-chip stocks pulled back from record levels Monday, but a rally in technology and Internet shares lifted the Nasdaq composite index into uncharted territory for a 10th consecutive session.

At the close, the Dow Jones industrial average was down 23.43 points at 9,080.89, and the Standard & Poor's 500 index was down 11.28 at 1,145.81.

Declining issues outnumbered advancing ones by a ratio of about 2-to-1 on the New York Stock Exchange.

But the Nasdaq composite was up 39.69 at 2,384.10. Fueling the rise were sharp gains in technology stocks, including Intel and Dell Computer and Internet shares such as Amazon.com, Yahoo! and Infoseek.

"It just gets more incredible every day," Barry Hyman, senior equity analyst at Ehrenkrantz King Nussbaum.

Intel, the biggest maker of computer chips, climbed 9% to 139 7/16. After a surge in holiday computer buying, Intel is expected to report a sharp increase in its profit for the period.

U.S. STOCKS

But blue-chip stocks were dragged down by concern that recent gains have made these shares too expensive, given the outlook for corporate profits.

"Shares rose too far too fast in a remarkable week in the market," said Franklin Morton, research chief at Ariel Capital Management in Chicago.

American Express, which gained 32 percent in the fourth quarter, was among the biggest decliners in the Dow, falling 2 1/4 to 105 13/16. General Electric, which rose 28 percent in the quarter, fell 2 1/2 to 59 11/16.

Campbell Soup fell 7 to 45 1/4 after the company said earnings in its 1999 financial year would probably fall short of analysts' expectations as the company cuts costs and reduces shipments of condensed soup in the U.S.

But General Motors rallied 6 to 86 1/16 after a J.P. Morgan Securities analyst, David Bradley, raised his 1999 earnings estimate for the automaker.

Analysts noted that the losses in other blue chips were subdued, given the size of the recent gains.

"From time to time the excesses have to pause," said Larry Wachtel, market analyst at Prudential Securities. "But it isn't like we're getting clobbered here."

Internet shares continued to surge. The on-line brokerage firm

Goldman Co-Chief Steps Down

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches

NEW YORK — Jon Corzine resigned Monday as co-chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group LP after the investment bank's bond business posted huge losses in its fourth quarter, derailing plans to go public.

Mr. Corzine, 52, will keep his job as co-chairman with Henry Paulson, 52, who becomes the sole chief executive at the biggest Wall Street partnership. Mr. Corzine will step away from day-to-day operating responsibilities to guide the firm's plans to sell stock to the public for the first time and dissolve Goldman's 130-year-old partnership, the firm said.

"I believe this is in the best long-term interest of the firm," Mr. Corzine said in a statement. "As we transition management at the top, I will now concentrate my energies on successfully completing our initial public offering."

Goldman canceled the offering in September after trading losses slashed fourth-quarter profit 81 percent to $107 million, the firm's worst performance since 1994.

A company statement did not say when Goldman might again attempt its offering, but a source close to the company said it would probably be this spring because of strong results for the quarter ending Feb. 28.

John Thain, 43, and John Thornton, 45, were named co-chief operating officers, and the firm created a 15-member management committee to replace its executive committee. That sets them up to lead the firm jointly one day, the Goldman source said. Mr. Thain was Goldman's chief financial officer, and Mr. Thornton had been in charge of international operations.

Some executives have said Goldman could have a market value of $30 billion. The firm canceled the public offering days after 14 banks and brokerages, including Goldman, bailed out Long-Term Capital Management LP, a hedge fund that lost more than $4 billion on bonds.

Goldman, under Mr. Corzine, made many of the same bets as the fund, executives said.

Lucent Sets a Deal and May Be Close to Another

NEW YORK — Lucent Technologies Inc., the largest maker of telecommunications equipment in the world, said Monday it was buying Kestrel Systems Corp., a provider of billing software, for about $1.5 billion in stock.

But the move also reportedly on the verge of a much larger deal for Lucent Communications Inc., a computer networking supplier based in Alameda, California. The Financial Times and USA Today reported that Lucent was close to a deal to buy Ascend for as much as $16 billion.

Lucent and Ascend declined to comment on the newspaper reports. But investors responded by pushing up Ascend's stock price by $5.25 to close at $76.6875. Lucent's shares fell $2.3125 to $112.9375.

Under the terms of the deal announced Monday, Lucent will exchange about 12.9 million shares of its stock for Kestrel, which is privately held. Kestrel will become a subsidiary of Lucent and retain its headquarters in Cambridge, Massachusetts, the companies said.

Dan Stanzone, Lucent's chief operating officer, said he expected the acquisition to contribute to Lucent's growth outside the United States.

Kestrel's customers include communications carriers such as British Telecom PLC, MCI Telecommunications Inc. and France Telecom S.A. Kestrel customers outside the United States generate about 40 percent of the company's revenues. "We weren't a player in this business, so we decided to jump to the head of the pack by acquiring the hottest player in the business," Mr. Stanzone said.

Adding Ascend, meanwhile, would give Lucent the powerful computer switches it needs to compete with Cisco Systems Inc. in the market for Internet gear sold to phone companies.

Ascend has developed a computer switch for routing large amounts of data on phone networks that Cisco will not be able to match until midyear, analysts have said.

"If Lucent buys Ascend, they'll be filling a key hole in their product line," said Craig Johnson, principal analyst with Pina Group, a market-research company.

Since its spin-off from AT&T Corp. more than two years ago, Lucent has used its high-flying shares to buy companies that can give it new technology and inroads to new customers.

Lucent and Ascend have talked in the past, though the companies have not been able to agree on a price, a person familiar with those earlier discussions said.

Perhaps to clear the decks for such a deal, Ascend is expected to announce soon that it is selling its Stratus Enterprise Computer Division for more than $100 million to a group led by Investorco, the Middle East investment group.

Ascend acquired the division when it bought Stratus Computer Inc. for about $800 million in October. At the time, Ascend announced it would sell all its non-telecommunications business units, including enterprise computing and software operations. The new company, which will restore the name Stratus Computer and be based in Marlboro, Massachusetts, provides servers to large businesses.

A Graphics Highflier Comes Down to Earth

By Elizabeth Corcoran

Washington Post Service

SAN FRANCISCO — Years ago, Silicon Graphics Inc. made a promise to its customers: to build powerful computers for displaying complex graphics at a price "for the masses."

On Monday, executives say, it made good on that pledge. Silicon Graphics rolled out the first in a new line of computers that use Intel Corp.'s microprocessors and Microsoft's Windows NT operating system. It is a dramatic change for a company that has long prided itself on building its systems around its own computer chips and software. The move also represents, the company hopes, the best way for returning to profitability. Silicon Graphics lost $44 million on sales of $616 million in the quarter that ended Sept. 30, the most recent in a chain of red-ink quarters.

The new products "will allow us to rejuvenate our business," especially in desktop systems, said the company's chief executive, Richard Belluzzo.

In the early 1990s, Silicon Graphics was a highflier, providing the horsepower for some of the early pioneers in computer graphics.

But in recent years, as conventional personal computer chips and software became more powerful, Silicon Graphics technology began to look expensive.

"The world is very different now than five years ago," said Todd Johnson, senior vice president for worldwide marketing. The company discovered that providing the very best technology — at a premium price — was not enough to guarantee financial success.

The point of the announcement Monday, he said, is that Silicon Graphics is determined to match the low prices of competitors such as Intergraph Corp. and Dell Computer Corp. By around the year 2003, he expects that Silicon Graphics' entire line of computers will be based on Intel and Microsoft technology.

Shopping.com to Go To Compaq for Cash

Bloomberg News

HOUSTON — Compaq Computer Corp. agreed Monday to buy Shopping.com for $220 million in cash to expand its Internet-commerce offerings.

Compaq, a maker of personal computers and servers, said it would acquire all the shares outstanding of Shopping.com, an on-line retailer based in Corona del Mar, California, for $19 each.

Shopping.com shares rose $5.40625 to close at $18.59375. Compaq advanced $2.75 to $48.25.

Shopping.com will complement Compaq's AltaVista, a site for searching the Internet, Compaq said. AltaVista links to shopping sites run by Compaq partners.

Compaq, based in Houston, is looking to lure more consumers with on-line shopping and search capabilities, and trying to show its corporate customers that it can run an electronic-commerce site that serves millions.

"AltaVista is underutilized," said Bill Milton, an analyst at Brown Brothers

Tiptoeing Through the Minefield: Fund Chiefs Pick Next Hot Spots

By Rick Gladstone
New York Times Service

NEW YORK — South Korea is reviving. Thailand is not far behind. Europe may be less sexy than it looks, and Latin America is a minefield. As for Russia, it is an investor's version of the place you go to after losing at the video game Mortal Kombat: a long, hard fall into a pit full of spikes.

These are the themes that emerge from a sampling of some top-performing international fund managers — leaders both in the fourth quarter of 1998 and the longer term.

Burned by bad bets the past two years in Eastern Europe, Asia and Latin America, they are treading carefully through the global economic uncertainties looming this year, with few taking big gambles.

Within the countries they deem less risky, the professionals see some undervalued stocks, but they are concentrating mainly on relatively strong, established businesses that appear to be in the best positions to weather unforeseen storms.

Finding relative safety in emerging markets is the bigger challenge. "There's some value to be found in the wreckage, but it's worrisome," said Lilia Clemente, chief executive of Clemente Capital, a New York-based investment company. She manages Citizens Global Equity fund and other international funds.

Ms. Clemente said that although she had seen some improvement in Asia, "we have just stayed away from the volatility in Russia."

"We used to be overweighted in Latin America, and now we're not," she said. "All the uncertainty remains high."

Many managers see the best prospects in three market areas: South

Korea, Thailand and the major economies of Europe.

South Korea: If there is any consensus about where opportunity may lie this year, it is here: A year after it verged on default, South Korea has reduced indebtedness, upgraded its credit rating, stabilized its currency, reduced interest rates and begun the steps deemed necessary by the International Monetary Fund to restore economic vitality.

The government started restructuring the unwieldy conglomerates, or chaebols, considered largely responsible for the country's economic problems. Many of the businesses emerging from that streamlining are basically sound, and their stocks trade at big discounts.

"Six months ago, everyone assumed South Korea's restructuring would fail, and now it's starting to dawn on everyone that it might work," said Mark Headley, a co-manager of the Matthews Korea and Matthews Pacific Tiger funds, both of which ranked among the top international stock funds in the final quarter of 1998, largely because of a resurgence in South Korean stocks.

Mr. Headley said he especially liked Samsung Electronics, a leading maker and exporter of televisions, computers, memory chips and telecommunications equipment that has benefited from the overhaul of the chaebol. It is attractive, he said, because the electronics business has been separated from a financially distressed sibling, Samsung Automotive, which is no longer a drag on the stock. Its price more than doubled to 79,000 won ($67) at year-end from 32,599 won in September.

"Samsung is the obvious big blue chip, but you start realizing there are a lot of situations like that," Mr. Headley said.

He also likes Hana Bank, a survivor in a drastic winnowing of South Korean banks. Hana's stock finished 1998 at 13,300 won, more than doubling after early November. Even so, it still trades at less than 12 times 1999 estimated earnings, about half the ratio of many large U.S. commercial banks.

Mr. Headley said he began accruing Samsung shares a number of years ago, when they traded at roughly 100,000 won, and Hana shares in late 1997, when they cost about 5,000. Although he declined to specify where he thinks either stock is going this year, Mr. Headley said, "I think the Korean market in general has the potential to double again."

Thailand: The first of the Asian economies to plunge into crisis in 1997 when its currency, the baht, tumbled in value, Thailand is also among the first to show promise of a comeback.

Ms. Clemente, who recently returned from a three-week trip to Asia, said the economic outlook for Thailand was slowly improving, the baht had strengthened, and the "real economy" was "showing signs of bottoming out."

Ms. Clemente said she liked three Thai stocks that stood to benefit from an economic revival: BEC World PCL, a leading entertainment conglomerate that has a government concession for one of the country's four television channels; Bangkok Bank PCL, the most dominant of the three big Thai banks; and Siam Cement Co., a leading maker of construction materials, auto accessories and petrochemicals.

BEC and Bangkok Bank shares performed poorly in 1998, but shares of Siam, which as a construction company is considered a leading economic indicator, more than doubled in the last quarter, to 540 baht ($16). Ms. Clemente said the stock could reach 1,000 baht in the next 12 to 18 months.

She said shares of BEC, which closed the year at 200 baht, could rise to 360, and that Bangkok Bank, which finished 1998 at 52 baht, could reach 100.

Very briefly:

• Assets managed by direct-marketed, or no-load, fund companies in 401(k) and defined-contribution retirement plans nearly quadrupled to $52.9 billion in 1997 from $13.6 billion in 1996 and accounted for 49.4 percent of all money flowing into such funds, according to a study by Cerulli Associates, a research and consulting firm in Boston. Although 1998 numbers are not yet available, the trend is believed to have continued last year, the company said.

• The Vinik Partners hedge fund, managed by Jeffrey Vinik, rose about 45 percent after fees, beating the 1998 returns of both the Standard & Poor's 500 Index and his former fund, Fidelity Investments' flagship Magellan Fund.

• The Kansas City Board of Trade is trying to find out whether investor enthusiasm for Internet-related stocks spills over to futures and options. If federal regulators give the go-ahead, the exchange will offer options and the first-ever futures tied to Internet shares, based on an index of 50 stocks such as Amazon.com, which sells books and compact disks over the Internet, and Lycos Inc., a Web navigator.

• Japanese investors bought a net 970.4 billion yen ($8.7 billion) of foreign bonds in December as investors sought higher returns overseas. Investors also bought a net 103.6 billion yen of foreign stocks last month, the Ministry of Finance said in a preliminary report. Final figures for December will be released in February. Foreign investors bought a net 78.8 billion yen of Japanese bonds and 94.8 billion yen of Japanese stocks in December, the ministry said.

What's Behind Amazon.com's Boom?

By Doreen Carvajal
New York Times Service

NEW YORK — For Amazon.com, the best-seller that really mattered last week was not a book title, but the company's stock. Whether it was simply more Internet frenzy or a further sign that on-line commerce may require its own investment calculus, the company's shares had a remarkable run.

Amazon.com Inc., an Internet book-seller that has yet to report a profitable quarter since going public in May 1997, saw its share price soar nearly 50 percent in the first trading week of the new year. Since the beginning of December, the stock has climbed 150 percent.

Some of the run-up last week came in response to news — a stock split, word of robust holiday sales of the company's books and compact disks, a deal to acquire a new warehouse. But mainly, optimistic investors seemed willing to buy Amazon.com shares at any price.

At one point Friday, Amazon.com's total stock market value surged past $30 billion, making it worth more than a major industrial company such as Texaco Inc. Even after some investors had second thoughts and the stock retreated sharply from its high point, Amazon.com's market value of $25.4 billion was still more than the total of two leading conventional retailers, J.C. Penney Co. and Kmart Corp.

Amazon.com's shares closed Friday at $160.25, up $13.75 for the day, after trading as high as $199.125. The stock was at $176, up $15.75, in afternoon trading Monday.

Some analysts say this unrestrained enthusiasm despite the company's lack of profit may reflect investors' appreciation for Amazon.com's sales momentum and the value of its dominant position as the leading electronic bookseller.

On Friday, for example, Broadcast.com Inc., which provides video and audio programs on the Internet, saw its shares soar $65.50, or 49.6 percent, to close at $197.50, after trading as high as $230. In the absence of news that would justify such a surge, Nasdaq officials asked the company to offer an explanation, but Broadcast.com declined to provide one. (The company announced a 2-for-1 stock split Monday, and its stock was surging again, up $56.625 at $254.125 in afternoon trading.)

In such a context, some Internet bears see more greed than logic in the meteoric rise of Amazon.com.

"How can you explain this behavior?" said Rick Berry, an analyst in Atlanta with J.P. Turner & Co., who is advising investors to sell Amazon.com's stock. "It's avarice in its most pure form. It's the 'greater fool' theory, which is that someone buys stock in the hope that someone is going to come from behind and buy it for even more."

Mr. Berry said the market surge last week in Amazon would probably represent a buying climax, and he said he expected the stock to start falling 30 percent to 50 percent in the first quarter.

But other analysts see an underlying logic, even if it does not conform to conventional investing theory.

On Tuesday, with Amazon.com's stock price booming and the Seattle-based company announcing a 3-for-1 stock split, Amazon.com said its fourth-quarter sales had quadrupled to $250 million as its electronic "store" drew more than a million new customers in the holiday season, when it started expanding its product lines to include stuffed toys and consumer electronic goods.

That expansion impresses Derek Brown, an analyst with Volpe Brown Whelan in San Francisco, who said investors were speculating on the company's future prospects.

"Amazon's sales have gone from nowhere to $250 million," said Mr. Brown, who added that its fourth-quarter sales had exceeded his expectations by 30 percent to 40 percent. "They're on a run rate for a billion dollars a year. That revenue used to be going to traditional booksellers. I think Amazon is taking market share and expanding the market, and the question is, who are they taking market share from?"

The third-place Internet bookseller, Borders Group, has suffered from the view that the bookstore chain has not invested aggressively enough in the Internet. Its new chief executive, Philip Pfeiffer, said in late December that the company needed to start doing more to promote its activities on the Internet even as it continued a rapid international expansion of its stores.

Barnes & Noble Inc. has seen its own electronic store remain lodged in the No. 2 spot and is losing money itself. But Bertelsmann AG of Germany is its new partner in the venture, and Bertelsmann's new chief executive, Thomas Middelhoff, predicts that Barnesandnoble.com will overtake Amazon.com next year.

Last week, Barnes & Noble announced that its on-line sales in the seven-week holiday period that ended Jan. 2 rose to $17.8 million, nearly quadruple the year-earlier total.

But can the more traditional booksellers beat the upstart Amazon.com in the publicity wars?

"I think one of the biggest reasons behind Amazon's success is the fact that they do have brand momentum — Amazon gets a tremendous amount of free publicity," Mr. Brown said. "Investors could lose interest in them, but right now they are the dominant e-commerce player, and there is little to suggest that they won't be dominant in the future."

1. The first step in the process of creating a new product is to identify a market need. This involves conducting market research to determine what consumers want and what problems they are facing.

2. Once a market need has been identified, the next step is to develop a concept for a product that addresses this need. This involves brainstorming ideas and creating a prototype.

3. The third step is to conduct a feasibility study to determine if the product is viable. This involves analyzing the market, the competition, and the potential for success.

4. If the feasibility study is positive, the next step is to develop a business plan. This involves outlining the financial aspects of the product, including costs, revenue, and profit.

5. The final step is to launch the product into the market. This involves creating a marketing strategy to promote the product and reaching out to potential customers.

Vikings Still Romping

Cardinals Start Slowly and Lose, 41-21

By Mike Freeman
New York Times Service

MINNEAPOLIS — Jake Plummer's first four passes in the biggest game of his life were something out of a nightmare. Passes No. 1 and No. 2: badly overthrown incompletions. Pass No. 3: a beautifully thrown ball to the Minnesota safety Robert Griffith. Plummer, the Arizona quarterback, liked Griffith so much, he found him again on the next series on his fourth pass.

Plummer would recover from his disastrous start and Arizona's minus-1 yard of total offense in the first quarter Sunday — the only place to go after that kind of start is up — but it would be too late. Minnesota took a second-quarter lead of 17-0 and then a halftime lead of 24-7.

Plummer, the comeback kid, had the Vikings right where he wanted them, right? Not this time. Playing the Vikings is like being in the Olympic 200-meter sprint, with Minnesota the equivalent of Michael Johnson.

For an opponent to have any chance of winning, staying close early is a necessity; otherwise, on this slick artificial turf, the Vikings will blow past as if they are on jet-propelled roller skates.

Minnesota beat the Cardinals, 41-21, before 63,760 at the Metrodome and advanced to the National Conference title game against the Atlanta Falcons because the Vikings were again successful with their three-pronged formula: smart coaching, speed and big plays.

The smart coaching came when the Vikings used 15 different formations in their first 15 plays, adding wrinkles like a direct snap to running back David Palmer with quarterback Randall Cunningham playing decoy wide receiver.

The speed was evident in a defense that smothered Plummer, chasing him all over the field. At times he looked slower than the 270-pound (122-kilogram) linemen trying to ruin his day.

The big plays? Randy Moss, the Vikings' Pro Bowl wide receiver, beat Aeneas Williams, the Cardinals' Pro Bowl cornerback, for a 45-yard completion in the second quarter. That play led to Minnesota's second touchdown, a 15-yard pass from Cunningham to his tight end, Andrew Glover. In the third quarter, Cris Carter caught a pass for 45 yards, leading to a 20-yard field goal by Gary Anderson.

When they are on a roll, the Vikings, who are 16-1 this season, cannot be stopped.

"Yes, that's true," said the Viking cornerback Jimmy Hitchcock. "Once we get into our groove, playing our A-plus game, you can't beat us."

Said Glover: "In 20-something games, we've only lost once. When we're at home, we're impossible to beat. Only the Vikings can truly beat the Vikings."

Minnesota players are not being cocky with those statements — they are factual. This team is built so that if the offense gets ahead, the defense comes hard, as it did against Plummer, who completed 23 of 41 passes for 242 yards, and the two interceptions.

And the Vikings' offense always

seems to get ahead because it has more weapons than any other team in the league. Beyond Moss (four catches for 73 yards), Carter (five catches for 82 yards) and Cunningham (17 of 27 for 236 yards and three touchdowns), there are other weapons in the arsenal. Robert Smith had 19 carries for 124 yards. Glover had several key catches. Fullback Leroy Hoard had touchdowns runs of one, 16 and 6 yards, becoming the first Viking to score three touchdowns in a playoff game.

"Obviously, we couldn't stop their offense," said the Arizona safety Tommy Bennett. "If you can't stop the run, it opens up the pass. They have four outstanding receivers. Cunningham has a lot of go-to guys, and it's hard to stop all of them."

Plummer tried to revive the Cardinals, but he was too excited early and bothered by the crowd noise. "It was loud, you know, it was a different situation," he said. Several times Plummer wanted to check with the offensive coordinator Marc Trestman about changing a play, but could not hear what Trestman was saying, even though Trestman's voice was piped into Plummer's helmet.

Top Chief Quits After Bad Season

The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — Marty Schottenheimer quit as coach of the Kansas City Chiefs on Monday after a season in which his team was one of the National Football League's biggest disappointments.

"After 10 years it's time to give someone else an opportunity to implement their plan," Schottenheimer said. "I've decided to take a break, to take some time and relax."

The announcement came after Schottenheimer's first losing season as an NFL coach, one in which the Chiefs finished 7-9 and missed the playoffs. He had a franchise-record winning percentage of .636 (101-58-1) in 10 seasons in Kansas City. But the past season — in which the Chiefs were thought to be Super Bowl material — was especially disheartening.

Meanwhile, Ray Rhodes, fired as the Philadelphia Eagles' coach two weeks ago, will be hired as coach of the Green Bay Packers, succeeding Mike Holmgren, NFL sources said Monday.

Holmgren was hired last week as coach, and general manager of the Seattle Seahawks.

Rhodes's hiring would be part of an unusual exchange since the Packers' quarterbacking coach, Andy Reid, was hired Monday as the Eagles' head coach.

NFL Redskins Sold For $800 Million

The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The bidding war for the Washington Redskins, a blue-chip sports franchise, is over.

With a bid of "approximately $800 million," a North American professional sports record, the brothers Howard and Edward Milstein and Daniel Snyder were named Monday as the new owners of the National Football League franchise.

The price surpassed the $530 million that Alfred Lerner spent last year for the Cleveland Browns football team. Rupert Murdoch has a world record offer of $1 billion pending for the English soccer club Manchester United.

At the Controls, a Different, Older and More Mature Cunningham

Vantage Point/MICHAEL WILSON

MINNEAPOLIS — The stunning evolution of Randall Cunningham may not be an entirely new story, but it's fascinating nonetheless, especially as the new Cunningham ascends to levels of which the old Cunningham only dreamed.

It's a story of less being more and a reminder that immaturity almost always undermines talent.

What is supposed to be his football twilight instead is his dawn. At 35, after it appeared that selfishness and excess had sabotaged tons of potential, Cunningham has become a great National Football League quarterback, a leader and a revered teammate. Who could have known?

He doesn't play the way he did nine years ago in his first football life, doesn't sound the way he used to, doesn't conduct his life the way he used to. And goodness, did the Minnesota Vikings hit the lottery or what? After a decade marked by brilliant but erratic — even undependable — play, Cunningham is one step from leading a team to the Super Bowl.

His performance in Minnesota's 41-21 victory over the Arizona Cardinals on Sunday wasn't eye-popping; it was just numbingly efficient and productive: 17 completions in 27 attempts for 236 yards and three touchdowns.

As the primary star of the star-crossed Philadelphia Eagles from 1985 to 1995, Cunningham couldn't buy a playoff victory until his fourth attempt, and that one was over the New Orleans Saints, who never have won a playoff game.

Asked after the victory Sunday if this felt different than it did when he played games for the Eagles, Cunningham said: "I know I hadn't matured then. I know I'm much more mature now, my game and my lifestyle."

The last thing these Vikings need is an egomaniacal jerk who thinks he has to do it all. This is one of the great, great offenses in NFL history.

It's an offensive unit that's so scary, the Vikings can score 41 points, as they did Sunday, and Cunningham can say without an ounce of exaggeration, "I really believe we weren't on today."

The old Randall would have gloated after a big victory in the late 1980s and early 1990s. But marriage, a 1996 "retirement," a spiritual rebirth and perhaps the realization that he still had time to be all that he could be, have created a man and a football player who is completely likeable, even admirable.

The result is that the Minnesota Vikings have one of the best triggermen in football, and professional sports has an absolutely riveting story that reminds us that real life is so much stranger than even the best fiction.

Dominating Duval Captures PGA Season Opener

By Clifton Brown
New York Times Service

KAPALUA, Hawaii — He dominated this weekend. He has been the PGA Tour's biggest winner over the last 15 months. And after watching David Duval win Sunday for the eighth time in his last 27 starts, even more of his peers were convinced that Duval is the world's best player.

Duval played at a different level during the season-opening Mercedes Championships, as the rest of the field played for second place. Starting the final round Sunday with a five-shot lead, Duval was never threatened. People wondered not whether he would win, but by how much he would win.

So as Duval began 1999 with a virtuoso performance, others marveled at a player who keeps adding to both his reputation and his bank account. Shooting a final-round, five-under-par 68, Duval finished at 26 under for the tournament (260) and cruised to a nine-stroke victory at the Kapalua Plantation Course, well ahead of Mark O'Meara and Billy Mayfair, who tied for second place at 17-under 275.

Duval's current winning pace is the best since Nick Price won nine events in 15 months during the 1993 and 1994 seasons. By winning, Duval opened the season by winning the $468,000 first-place check, plus a new Mercedes-Benz SL 500 roadster.

But while Duval will surely enjoy the car and the money, nothing seems to alter his determination to be the best player he can be. And many are convinced he is already the best there is.

"Right now, there's no question he's the best in the world," said Fred Funk, who finished tied for fifth place. "I really don't think David feels pressure anymore. He's just going to beat you with pure talent. If you look at his game, there's absolutely no weaknesses. He's tremendously long, he's tremendously straight, really good chipper, and a really good putter. He's in a different league."

The Tour's opening event featured an elite 30-man field, limited to players who won at least once last year. By winning, Duval became the first player to qualify for next year's Mercedes Championships, but he has bigger goals in mind.

Since winning his first event at the 1997 Michelob Championship at Kingsmill in Williamsburg, Virginia, his appetite for victory has been insatiable. Duval won his final three starts in 1997, he won four events in 1998, he won last year's money title, and he started this year by picking up where he left off. A major championship is the biggest piece missing from Duval's resume, but tying for second place at last year's Masters only made Duval hungrier to achieve that goal.

In the meantime, he seems intent on winning as much as possible.

"I'm obviously playing quite well," said Duval. "Poor shots or mis-hits never really enter your mind. The confidence just kind of feeds on itself."

O'Meara shot a five-under-par 68 Sunday, while Mayfair shot a 71, but Duval turned the tournament into a runaway by shooting a 67 in the first round, tying the course record with a 63 in the second round, and shooting a splendid 68 in the third.

Funk, who played with Duval on Sunday, called Duval the best driver in the game. "I used to put Greg Norman in that category," Funk said, "but he's longer than Norman, and just as straight."

O.K., O.K. I'm Sorry

NEW YORK — I had to clear my desk before I got serious about 1999. I was amazed to find so much mail I hadn't answered.

One letter I had ignored said: "I'm sorry, I am really sorry. I'm sorry I hurt my family and my friends and most of all, the American people. I am really sorry."

The letter was signed, "John Gotti, Marion Federal Prison."

Another one I failed to answer said: "Dear Viewer, Have you ever been seriously abused by your dog? We are looking for volunteers to appear on a show we are doing titled 'How Many French Poodles Does It Take to Screw in a Light Bulb?'" The letter was signed by Jerry Springer.

A memo I never sent was discovered under my papers: "Cathy: Please write to the IRS and tell them I believe they made a mistake and they are entitled to far more money than they thought. I'll send in the check soonest. I'm sorry, I'm really sorry."

Another memo: "Send Ken Starr an RSVP saying that I can't appear in front of his grand jury as I'm going to the race track that day. I'm sorry. I'm really sorry."

"Cathy: Fax Fidel Castro — 'Will trade two Chinese Democratic Party donors for a Cuban pitcher and third baseman. I'm sorry we couldn't offer you more.'"

I found a Christmas card in my top drawer from Monica Lewinsky: "I have to talk to you. I have to talk to somebody. Please talk to me. I have so much to say. I'm sorry, I'm really sorry."

While clearing off my desk I found a memo pad that had reminders as to what columns I wanted to write in 1999.

• Do a poll of men who took Viagra and find out if they are better off today than they were a year ago. Interview those who respond "don't know" on the off chance there may be a story there.

• Find out the real reason why waiters in restaurants won't allow you to put pepper on your own food.

• Discover why offices and corporations leave their records open for everyone to see but lock their washrooms to the public.

• If Bill Gates has the public's welfare at heart why doesn't he make house calls?

That seems to have the desk cleared. Uh-oh. There is one more memo I found. All I know is that it says: "If you write about sex in Washington in 1999 say to the public, 'I'm sorry. I'm very sorry.'"

NEW YORK — Back to the days of neurosis, off-hand references to Dostoyevsky and the meaning of life. The Museum of Television and Radio is opening "Woody Allen's Television Days," a two-part screening series at the museum's branches in New York and Los Angeles.

Part I, "Sketches and Kvetches," including an appearance by Allen on "The Tonight Show" in 1962, runs until Feb. 18. Part II, "Tell It Again, Woody," including his only TV special, seen on CBS in 1969, runs from Feb. 19 through March 21.

Michel Petrucciani: Victory of the Spirit

By Mike Zwerin
International Herald Tribune

PARIS — One midsummer evening in 1978, pedestrians on the narrow unpaved main street of the village of Cloussac in the Drome region were startled when what looked like a puppet wearing Count Basie's yachting cap leaned out of an old tinny Citroen 2CV and exclaimed: "Hey baby!"

It was Michel Petrucciani. At the time they were the only words of English he knew. Living in the city of Montelimar, he was the headliner of Cloussac's monthly jam sessions. Provencal musicians were talking about a 15-year-old piano player of Corsican ancestry in a provincial backwater. He already played jazz like an African-American veteran.

It's a good thing he started early because he was not going to last all that long. Petrucciani died last week from a pulmonary infection at 36. He suffered from osteogenesis imperfecta, also known as "glass bones," which stunted his growth and made his bones brittle.

By 15 he had played with the legendary drummer Kenny (Klook) Clarke, who is credited with "discovering" him. Clark Terry, Joe Pass and the bluesman Sugar Blue "discovered" him shortly thereafter. The word was spreading. There is an early photo of Clark, flanked by Petrucciani's brother, the bassist Louis, and his father, Tony, a Wes Montgomery-style guitarist, who was carrying Petrucciani in his arms.

Later Petrucciani grew chunkier and his bones became somewhat sturdier and he could get around astonishingly well on his own with crutches. But when he was young, he had to be carried. Somehow there was always a carrier available. He looked embarrassed, and bemused at the same time. With raised eyebrows behind oversized glasses, his expression seemed to say: "Do you believe what happened to me?"

He was carried by his family and a succession of buddies. When he began to play with his good friend the French drummer Aldo Romano, and with such respected American musicians as Jim Hall, Lee Konitz and Charles Lloyd, each had their turn carrying him. It was something of an honor to be among those who carried Petrucciani. There were good-natured jokes about forming a club. He inspired good nature.

Lloyd had performed his rock-oriented jazz in Tallinn, Estonia, in the Soviet Union, in 1967 with a band of longhairs, including Keith Jarrett and Jack DeJohnette. It was an event; the story was on the front page of The New York Times. Then, after "sitting on a mountain pulling metaphorical weeds" in California for most of the 1970s, Lloyd came out of retirement when he met Petrucciani. "Michel changed my life," he said. "I never thought I'd ever play again."

In August 1980, when he was 17, Petrucciani was sitting between takes at a piano in a remote studio in southern France. It was his first recording, he was a sideman. Still, he was the guiding force. He may not have been the official leader, but he provided the focus.

There was silence while the musicians decided what to play next. Petrucciani asked: "Does anyone know 'Giant Steps'?" An up-tempo John Coltrane tune with fast-moving chords, it was a sort of test that divides the men from the boys. Nobody wanted to admit they might not pass it. Suddenly, Petrucciani announced: "Well, I do," and he erupted with great confidence into a solo version at breakneck speed.

His hands were large enough to span a tenth on the keyboard, an essential minimum for a normal professional pianist. As the years went by, he learned that he could live a normal life in other ways. Women were attracted to him. He had three important relationships and two children, one who also has "glass bones" and one adopted. He was proud to have children. He said: "My father never expected grandchildren from me. I think he respects me now."

He liked to party, to swing in more ways than one. He began to be seen as a sort of gangster of love. (This New Year's Eve he was in the Village Vanguard until dawn.) His small and fragile bones indirectly caused the pulmonary infection that killed him. His organs were compressed inside his shrunken trunk; he had had problems with asthma; he was pushing it. Some sort of breakdown always seemed to be lurking.

His sense of humor, however, was always solid. The accent was on irony. Although he frequently predicted that he would not live very long, his friends did not take him seriously. In retrospect, he was lucky to have lasted as long as he did. Even a small fall could have been fatal years earlier.

As a young pianist, he'd had to sit on a special stool to enable him to get a proper perspective on the keyboard; and his tiny legs pumped a custom-built pedal extension. In a musical sense, his disease was a blessing in the form of a handicap.

Like being blind, there was no choice other than the piano. He could not go and ride his bike or turn on television. He practiced for as much as six or seven hours a day. But it was a lot more than practice. It was The Gift. The Muse had chosen to give The Gift to Michel Petrucciani.

It was his confidence as much as his ability that caught your attention. He had no doubts about himself. He could do just about anything, and he kept learning to do more. As he grew older and better known, he became very well paid. In 1998 he played something like 140 concerts. He acquired more maturity, technique and individuality — particularly his solo playing. His between-tunes microphone patter drew good-natured laughter. He lost some soul along the way, becoming increasingly dependent on the applause. And it was always there.

His attitude, his talent, his humor and his take-no-prisoners approach to improvisation, combined with his affliction and the way it made him look, put him in a unique place. Clashes, racism and phobias disappeared when he was around. Everybody was honored to play with him — black and white, old and young, French and American, traditional and avant-garde.

After his death, the French press called him, along with Django Reinhardt, one of the best French jazz musicians ever. And one of the very few to have become a star in America. True enough, but he was way beyond such everyday qualifications.

Petrucciani reminded people of Dostoyevsky's "Idiot" — the "wholly beautiful man" whose function it was to disseminate a new state of being. He led them to re-evaluate their definitions of ugliness and beauty and of bad and good luck. He was a redeemer. Charles Lloyd called him an "avatar." It can be said without rhetoric that he was the personification of the victory of the spirit over the flesh.

Lincoln Center Considers Monumental Sale

New York Times Service

NEW YORK — The Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts is considering selling Jasper Johns' only public artwork, the monumental "Numbers, 1964," in hopes of raising as much as $15 million. It would be the first time Lincoln Center had parted with work from its impressive holdings, and opponents of the sale are worried about the implications of a sale.

The complex is faced with increasingly heavy production and maintenance costs, and some fear that if it sells "Numbers," it might also sell other works on its central plaza and in the lobbies of its buildings. The art, which thousands of music, theater and ballet devotees see year-round, includes pieces by Henry Moore, Elie Nadelman, Marc Chagall and David Smith.

For 35 years "Numbers" has graced the lobby of the New York State Theatre. It was commissioned by one of the building's architects, Philip Johnson, and has always hung in the spot selected by Johnson and Johns.

Word of the possible sale of "Numbers," an imposing 9-foot-by-7-foot painting of Johns' signature gridded numbers, has been circulating around the art world for months.

Bullock were named favorite film stars at the People's Choice Awards ceremony. The television stars Tim Allen and Helen Hunt and the singers Garth Brooks and Celine Dion also were among the honorees. "Frasier" and the now defunct "Seinfeld" tied for best TV comedy series. Three "all-time favorite" honors were given to Harrison Ford for movies, Bill Cosby for TV and Elton John for music. Most of the winners were chosen by a Gallup Poll representing 212 million Americans 13 years old and up. The all-time favorites were picked by a combination of polling and Internet voting.

Marvin Hamlisch will leave the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra next year to become the principal pops conductor for the National Symphony in Washington. Hamlisch, who wrote the score for the Broadway hit "A Chorus Line" and several scores for films and television, will retain his post as the pops conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.
